French Jews rally against Le Pen

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

PARIS — Declaring themselves proud to be French, France's Jewish community led protests against far-right leader Jean-Marie Le Pen on Sunday as he grew more confident of pulling off an upset win in a presidential runoff on May 5.

Carrying banners saying "France: Country of Human Rights" and "Jews against Le Pen," some 10,000 protesters gathered in Paris to rally against the National Front leader, who stunned France by qualifying for a runoff with President Jacques Chirac.

"We're sending one message and no other: I love the Republic and I'm against Le Pen," Johanna Samak, secretary general of the Union of French Jewish Students, said at the rally.

Sunday's emotional but peaceful rally came a day after fears of a victory by Le Pen brought up to 200,000 people onto the streets of Paris and other French cities to demand that voters reject his policies, which have made him a political pariah in Europe. Students planned more protests across France on Monday.

"It's everyone's duty to vote for the incumbent president Chirac," Rabbi Gilles Bernheim told the Jewish-led rally, which ended with a rousing rendition of the French national anthem, the Marseillaise.

Commentary

This past month, North American Jewry plunged back into history, finally standing up for Israel loudly and proudly after dithering for too long. Depending on crowd estimates, anywhere from a quarter of a million to half a million people rallied for Israel. From Capitol Hill in Washington D.C., on Monday to Parliament Hill in Ottawa on Sunday, day after day, Israel's 54th birthday week inspired a powerful affirmation of Jewish unity. Religious and non-religious, Ashkenazim and Sephardim, Canadians and Americans, leftists and rightists, stood as one to celebrate Israel's plucky democracy and renounce the evil terrorist campaign unleashed against Jews in Israel and abroad.

The challenge now is to ensure that the rallies signify a sea change in the Jewish community. For once the shouting and singing and speechifying of a rally ends, the real work begins. So far, as a community, we have not stood up to the historic challenges of 2001 and 2002. Yet the tragic story is far from over – we will have ample time to make amends in the coming months.

Europe's Jews plan strategy against anti-Semitism — please see page 38

The News in Brief

CANADA

Police Probe Rally

CALGARY — Police are investigating a pro-Palestinian rally here earlier this month, in which marchers were alleged to have shouted "Death to the Jews" in Arabic. Police are studying videotapes of the rally and translations of slogans chanted for possible charges of hatemongering. A rally organizer apologized to the Jewish community through the media, but there was no attempt to contact the community directly.

WJC Meeting

OTTAWA — Keith Landy, president of the Canadian Jewish Congress, and Moshe Ronen, chair of CJC's board of governors, attended last week's two-day meeting in Brussels of the World Jewish Congress executive. Anti-Semitism, particularly in western Europe, "is the worst it has been since World War II," Landy remarked in a statement, adding there is "palpable" insecurity among Europe's Jews. The WJC is establishing a European Jewish Information Centre to monitor anti-Semitic incidents.

ISRAEL

Jail Sentences

RAMALLAH — In a trial held in Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's besieged headquarters, an ad-hoc tribunal sentenced four men to jail terms ranging from one to 18 years for the killing of tourism minister Rechavam Ze'evi. Prime Minister Ariel Sharon rejected the sentences and called again for the men to be handed over to Israel.

Life Expectancy

JERUSALEM — Israeli women can expect to live until the age of 80.4, while men have an average life expectancy of 76.6 years, according to figures based on 1999 statistics. The numbers show that the average life expectancy for Israeli men and women has increased by two years since 1990.

Disabled Teen Wins

JERUSALEM — A blind and hearing impaired Israeli teen was one of two young people to win an annual international Bible quiz here. Avichai Sheli, 17, of Netivot, tied for first place with another teen. They topped 53 youths from 25 countries who took part in the annual Independence Day quiz. Sheli said he plans to volunteer for the army when he graduates from high school.

WORLD

Belgian Attacks

BRUSSELS — Gunmen opened fire on a Belgian synagogue April 20, Adolf Hitler's birthday. No one was hurt in the Shabbat attack in the southern city of Charleroi. The synagogue was empty when the drive-by shooting took place. It was the fourth anti-Semitic attack reported in Belgium in the past month. The next day, a crowd estimated at 5,000 called for an end to the anti-Jewish violence. Community leaders say the number of anti-Semitic incidents has risen to "a few a week" since Mideast violence escalated. Also last week, Jewish leaders from 24 countries met here to discuss the sharp rise in anti-Semitic attacks across Europe.

Jews March

SAO PAULO — The Jewish community here held what was described as the largest event in the 500-year history of Brazilian Jewry. Some 10,000 Jews joined a pro-Israel rally April 21, walking from the Israeli Consulate to the Hebraica club.

Jews Don't March

BERN — Swiss Jewish leaders have decided not to hold any pro-Israel rallies for fear of provoking an anti-Semitic backlash. The decision came at a recent closed-door meeting of the Swiss Federation of Jewish Communities. The Jewish leaders said hate letters and threats related to Mideast violence have reached record levels.

Centre Firebombed

CANBERRA — The National Jewish Centre here was firebombed April 20, Adolf Hitler's birthday. Police say the attackers tried to throw a bomb through a window, but it bounced back, setting fire to the building's grounds. Little damage was reported.

Jewish Identity

BERLIN — Police here have denied they are advising Jews to hide their identity for fear of attack. A police spokesperson reportedly told an Israeli reporter that Jews in Berlin might want to hide their Stars of David or avoid wearing yarmulkes because police can't protect everyone. But later the city's police chief denied police were giving Jews such advice.

N.Z. Snubs Israel

WELLINGTON, N.Z. — The government of New Zealand boycotted this year's Israel Independence Day celebrations. A spokesperson said the decision was "a reprimand to the Israeli government by New Zealand over aspects of Israel's policies which we do not regard as acceptable."

Cemetery Vandalized

BRATISLAVA — As many as 135 gravestones in the Orthodox section of a Jewish cemetery were destroyed or damaged in eastern Slovakia. Police are investigating whether the attack in Kosice was linked to Adolf Hitler's birthday on April 20.

Rabbi Dies

NEW YORK — Walter Wurzburger, a rabbi, teacher and editor, died April 16 at 82. He was past president of the Rabbinical Council of America and a member of the International Jewish Committee on Interreligious Consultations, a leading group dealing with the Vatican. From 1967 until last month, he taught philosophy at Yeshiva University, and from 1962 to 1988, he edited Tradition, an Orthodox intellectual quarterly.

Auschwitz Shopping Complex Set to Open

WARSAW — A small shopping centre, whose construction was once blocked by Jewish protests, is due to open shortly outside the former death camp of Auschwitz, its owner said last month.

The Polish news agency reported that local officials had issued a permit to open what is being officially termed "a parking and service complex."

The construction project was halted by the Polish authorities in 1996 following an international Jewish outcry alleging that such commercial activity dishonoured the memory of Auschwitz victims.

The centre's owner said he has modified the project to cater primarily to Auschwitz museum visitors. The complex includes a parking lot, post office, book shop, pharmacy and fast-food bar.

What really happened in Israeli flag incident?

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Two rally participants handcuffed in Ottawa mall

TORONTO — An incident at a downtown Ottawa shopping mall with alleged anti-Semitic overtones has the Internet abuzz and the Montreal Jewish community angry, but just what exactly happened is being hotly disputed.

Almost two weeks ago, shortly after thousands of Jews rallied on Parliament Hill in support of Israel, two young rally participants were handcuffed and arrested in Rideau Centre, allegedly for failing to put away an Israeli flag and for photographing the arrest.

The two Montreal men, Marc Abergel and David Abissidan, say that shortly after entering the shopping mall with several friends, two security guards approached them and told them to "take off your f…g flag."

Abergel said his questions as to why he was not allowed to carry the flag were met with more rude statements and a hostile attitude. He said that when he folded the flag and put it in his pocket and removed a camera from his pocket to do so, one of the guards, "without warning, pushed me to the wall and handcuffed me."

As they were leading him away to a security room on the mall's lower level, Abissidan shot one photograph, which prompted his arrest.

Alone in the security room with the guards, Abergel and Abissidan say the guards shouted at them using racist language.

"They began hostile verbally calling us 'dirty Jews,' 'f…g Jews' and 'f…ers,'" Abergel said.

Police, who had received two 911 emergency calls, one from the security guards and another from the two men's friends, arrived shortly afterwards and released Abergel and Abissidan.

Abergel is angry at the treatment they received. "We were not protesting in the mall. We were quietly minding our own business… We just went in for lunch."

Police are investigating the incident. Abergel would like the guards charged with illegal detention and assault.

However, a different picture is being painted by mall officials. Bob Hasler, general manager of Rideau Centre, said "we're still trying to make sure we have the whole story.

"The statements from the parties involved are widely divergent."

Mitchell Bellman, executive-director of the Ottawa Jewish Community Council, said he has met with Hasler and one of the security guards and "they tell a very different story than the other people. It's remarkable that the two stories are so different from each other."

Spate of incidents related to Mideast worries Montreal community

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A series of incidents that have taken place here since the pro-Israel rally two weeks ago reflect how high emotions are running as the Israeli-Palestinian conflict continues.

The most serious was an alleged physical attack and death threat at knifepoint against three Jewish students by a group of about 15 Arabic-speaking people, as the students were seen leaving the Centre Hillel on Gatineau Street in Côte des Neiges the day after the rally.

According to eyewitness accounts given to B'nai Brith Canada (BBC), the Jews were allegedly pushed and kicked by the assailants, who had been playing soccer in a park across from the centre.

"Witnesses claim that throughout the evening, the alleged attackers… were heard shouting, 'Allahu Aqbar,' 'death to the Jews,' and 'death to Israel,'" said Stephen Scheinberg, national chair of BBC's League for Human Rights.

Blaming the Jews, again

From the editor's desk

I had originally planned to use this space to write about some of my experiences during my recent visit to Israel. But the increasing stream of anti-Semitism reported last week, pouring forth from around the world, and the nature of some of the local Canadian commentary on that anti-Semitism, compel me to set aside my original plan.

That will have to wait for another week.

The following incidents were reported last week by the Jewish Telegraphic Agency:

• An April 11 truck explosion at a Tunisian synagogue in which 16 people were killed, including 11 German tourists, was definitely a terror attack, according to Germany's interior minister.

• The National Jewish Centre in Canberra, Australia, was firebombed on Shabbat morning. Luckily, little damage was done.

• As many as 135 gravestones in a Jewish cemetery in Kosice, Slovakia, were destroyed or damaged.

• Two Jewish leaders, Avraham Berkowtiz, executive director of the Federation of Jewish Communities in the former Soviet Union, and Moscow Chief Rabbi Pinchas Goldschmidt, were attacked when they came to Brussels to attend a meeting of the European Jewish Congress.

As ugly and offensive as these incidents were, the one that made me catch my breath most deeply was the following:

• Israeli doctors braced for an attempt to oust the Israel Medical Association (IMA) from the World Medical Association (WMA). The head of the IMA, Dr. Yoram Blachar, said he expected anti-Israel resolutions to be presented at the upcoming meeting of the WMA in Geneva.

The IMA is a non-political professional organization with some 20,000 members, including hundreds of Arab Israeli doctors.

As part of its effort to head off the acrimony in Geneva, the IMA drafted a declaration last week affirming its allegiance to the Hippocratic Oath. According to the Jerusalem Post, the IMA affirmed that the "obligation as doctors and as human beings to the people of both nations [Israelis and Palestinians] takes precedence over any dispute or confrontation." Blachar asked Dr. Ron Pundak, an architect of the Oslo agreement who now works at the Peres Peace Centre, to find a Palestinian counterpart to sign the declaration. But Pundak, did not get back with a name.

There are also disturbing reports, as of this writing unconfirmed, of business and academic associations considering sanctions or other disciplinary measures against their Israeli counterparts.

We have a right to ask ourselves where the world is headed. Is it so ruled by age-old obsessions that it must always remain blind to the truth?

We need not however raise the question only in relation to Europe. Examples of anti-Semitism and uninformed, twisted writing related to it, alas, abound closer to home, too.

A breathtaking example of such writing appeared in the Globe and Mail last week by Naomi Klein, the proudly self-styled "critic both of the Israeli occupation and of corporate-dictated globalization."

"Jews outside Israel," Klein wrote, "now find themselves in a tightening vise: The actions of the country that was supposed to ensure their future safety are making them less safe right now... And when anti-Semitism rises at least partly as a result of his actions, it is Mr. [Ariel] Sharon who is positioned once again to collect the political dividends."

Ruled by her ideology, Klein's brazen disdain of Israel's prime minister brings her to echo the very same calumnious line of thought that has spilled from the lips of anti-Semites throughout the ages. Aping the nasty traditions of millennia, she essentially blames the Jews for anti-Semitism. In so doing, she lets every bigot and hater of Jews off the hook.

As if this were not objectionable enough, Klein appears to care little for truth or facts and writes wide, sweeping distortions that only add to the hostility of the present anti-Semitic climate which she, ironically, decries.

"For Mr. Sharon, Jewish fear is a guarantee that his power will go unchecked, granting him the impunity needed to do the unthinkable: send troops into the Palestinian Authority's education ministry to steal and destroy records; bury children alive in their homes..."

This vile invective is on a par with the worst, most hateful form of incitement against Israel and Jews.

Klein celebrates the "hundreds of globalization activists who began flocking to Ramallah to act as 'human shields' between Israeli tanks and Palestinians." But how in good conscience, let alone in good or fair commentary, could Klein not mention that those "Palestinians" were in fact Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat, his cadre of advisors and the men wanted for the murder of Rechavam Zelevi?

How in good conscience could she not provide even one syllable of context for Israel's decision to undertake its military operation, could she not mention the repeated slaughter of Jews by Palestinian terrorists culminating in the butchery on leil seder Pesach in Netanyah?

Israel's military actions have nothing to do with "occupation." The vast majority of Israelis, including Sharon, have often declared their desire to get out of the West Bank and Gaza. Israel's immediate past prime minister even offered the Palestinian leader in Ramallah a treaty to that effect. But that leader chose to make war.

Such details are odd but rather telling omissions for someone who is a critic of the Israeli occupation. —MBD

RAINY DAY RALLY: The Israel Action Committee, a grassroots organization, held a rally at Queen's Park last Sunday to show support for Israel and voice opposition to the funding of international terrorist organizations by sympathizers here in Canada. Speakers included Donna Holbrook, Canadian director of International Christian Embassy, Jerusalem, Canada, and Zehavit Ben Hillel from the Israeli Consulate in Toronto . At least one rally participant, her voice cracking with emotion, approached Holbrook to thank her for her support.

Star loses funeral home ads over Mideast coverage

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two Toronto funeral chapels are ending long-standing advertising relationships with the Toronto Star over concerns the newspaper's coverage of the Middle East is biased against Israel – a claim Star publisher John Honderich flatly rejects.

In addition, several real estate developers have pulled ads from the Star, according to the agency that places their ads.

Benjamin's Park Memorial Chapel has been advertising in the Star for 22 years and Steeles Memorial Chapel for about that long as well, say spokespersons for the firms.

Benjamin's announced its decision in an advertisement in The CJN last week, saying its death and shivah notices will now appear on its Web site and in the National Post. The ads, which ran in the Star six days a week, cost close to $100,000 per year, said Michael Benjamin, spokesperson for the family-run chapel.

"This decision is based on what we believe to be the Toronto Star's biased language and coverage of the conflict in the Middle East," the ad stated.

Benjamin said the Star's coverage of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict has been problematic since at least the onset of the intifadah 18 months ago, but "the last four months have just been incredibly biased." The newspaper always seems to colour its stories in a way to "criticize Israel the most," he said.

The cumulative affect of the Star's approach over many months was to "create an atmosphere in which anti-Semitism could grow in Toronto and Canada. Any anti-Semitic feeling lingering below the surface could have fertile ground to grow in," Benjamin said.

"As a company that deals solely with the Jewish community, it was insensitive for us to support with advertising money a paper making it more and more difficult for our community to live."

Steeles vice-president John Pollock said the chapel "had no obligation to support or subsidize a newspaper which has a consistently anti-Israel bias, both in its news content and editorials. For that reason, we have decided to discontinue our advertising in the Star."

Steeles' final ad in the Star ran last week and the company will switch most of its advertising to the National Post. Advertising worth from $8,000 to $10,000 per month will be affected, Pollock said.

Steeles' executive group was particularly concerned about the Star's coverage since the Passover massacre, when 28 Israelis were killed as a result of a suicide bombing at a seder in Netanya. Pollock said the coverage has been pro-Arab.

"They haven't been balanced. We don't necessarily want them to be pro-Israel, but we want them to be balanced in their newspaper," he said.

Sam Moses, vice-president of new homes for Norman Hill Realty, said several of his clients, concerned over the paper's Mideast coverage, have asked him not to place their ads in the Star. Moses said his company, which books ads for major players in the real estate industry, has looked to magazines and other periodicals as a replacement, though "you get your best bang for the buck at the Star."

"[The Star has] lost hundreds of thousands of dollars of revenue over the last year" as a result of real estate ads that have been pulled in response to the paper's coverage, Moses said.

Honderich maintained the Star's coverage has been even-handed, a point he said he made in discussions with Benjamin last week.

"Our policy is to provide fair and balanced coverage, as for all stories. That's what we try to bring to every story and this one is no exception," Honderich said.

"I do not believe the stories are slanted against Israel. We're fair and balanced."

Honderich rejected Benjamin's suggestions the paper's coverage could lead to anti-Semitism. Asserting that was a case of "shooting the messenger," Honderich said, "it's not the Star's coverage, it's events in the Middle East that lead to that."

The Star reports on anti-Semitic incidents more vigorously than other newspapers, Honderich added.

Benjamin said his family considered pulling its advertising during the early months of the intifadah in late 2000. However, at the time no other newspaper offered the late deadlines that would allow death notices to appear in the next day's paper. (Under Jewish law, the deceased must be buried as soon as possible and notice of the funeral must be disseminated quickly.)

That would have created hardships in the community, he said. However, the National Post recently agreed to extend its deadline from 4 p.m. to 8 p.m., allowing Benjamin's to place notices later in the day to ensure the widest possible exposure. That opened the door for the funeral chapel to take its stand against the Star's Mideast coverage, Benjamin said.

Eighteen months ago, when the Star's Mideast coverage angered many in the Jewish community, David Fuss was faced with a similar dilemma. As president of Incredible Electronics, he relied on the Star to provide an effective advertising vehicle for his retail electronics firm. But in protest of the paper's coverage, he withdrew two full-page ads that ran weekly and cost $23,000.

He met with Honderich to discuss the coverage and resumed advertising for a short time afterwards. Eventually, however, he felt nothing had changed and he pulled Incredible's ads completely. The resulting drop-off in sales played a part in his strategic decision to switch from a two-store retail company to a one-outlet wholesaler, Fuss said.

Fuss does not regret his choice. "It was very unbalanced coverage and Honderich didn't really care about our concerns," he said.

As for the Star's coverage today, "I think it still sucks," Fuss said. Benjamin said he would reconsider his decision if "they (the Star) are more sensitive, more aware of the language being used in the articles and understand there has to be a more balanced approach."

Israel needs a military victory: ZOA president

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The tensions and violence in Israel and the Palestinian Authority have nothing to do with land, but rather with Israel's existence itself, says the president of the Zionist Organization of America.

"What we need now," said Morton Klein to an audience of about 100 people at Beth Tzedec Congregation last week, "is an absolute, unequivocal and convincing military victory."

Klein and the century-plus-old organization he heads used to be vilified for their lack of support of the Oslo accords, he said in a lecture co-sponsored by the synagogue and Canadian Friends of Boys Town Jerusalem. "No one calls me any more and says, 'Can't you support Oslo?'"

From Day One, said Klein, PA chair Yasser Arafat spoke publicly in Arabic of destroying Israel, refused to get rid of illegal weapons, and paid families of suicide bombers. "And we were simply ignoring it."

The Palestinian culture is the same as that of pre-war Nazi Germany, said Klein, who is a child of Holocaust survivors. Had the signs not been ignored, war could have been prevented, he said. "Jewish leaders told us then that publicly exposing Germany's actions and publicly condemning Americans for not doing anything, would only make things worse."

Textbooks used by Palestinian children from grades 1 to 12 "openly stated that Jews are evil, the Jews are the enemy, are fanatics, treacherous, kill Muslims and Christians and that there is no alternative but to destroy Israel."

Sermons broadcast on Palestinian TV praise suicide bombers and encourage killing of Jews, he said. The official newspaper of the PA has accused Israel of causing cancer, and mad cow disease and injecting Arab children with the AIDS virus, he added.

"The whole culture honours and blesses and glorifies people who murder Jews."

Given those claims, said Klein sarcastically, it's "extraordinary" that in 1948 there were 150,000 Palestinian Arabs in the region and today there are 2.5 million.

"This is not a shocking thing that suddenly we had a war 1½ years ago."

Klein, who has written and been quoted extensively in the media, said the Arabs "know that if they make peace with Israel, their lives will improve dramatically." The issue has never been economics, he said. "It's been ideology and principle."

Nor is there an Israeli occupation, he insists. "Ninety-nine per cent of the Palestinian Arabs in Judea and Samaria live under their own rule. Israel gave 42 per cent of that land away to Arafat. The other 58 per cent is uninhabited, except for 2 per cent."

Klein criticized the American government for accusing Israel of "over-responding" to Palestinian attacks when it is forcefully attacking Afghanistan and killing many civilians in the process. "In 1941, we didn't say let's negotiate with Japan, or with Hitler. We went to war. We went all out."

Rabbis to demonstrate true meaning of pluralism

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — At a unique event sponsored by Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, three rabbis will demonstrate the true meaning of pluralism.

This Sunday, May 5, Rabbi Jay Kelman of Beth Jacob Synagogue, Rabbi Howard Morrison of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, and Rabbi Michael Dolgin of Temple Sinai will together explore Torah texts on revelation.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, rabbinic director at Kolel, said what is unique about the event is that the rabbis will "dialogue, not debate.

"True pluralism exists when no one has to prove that their way is the right way. There is not a lot of opportunity to learn about someone else's point of view without it turning into a debate," she said.

There is a lot of fragmentation and even ill will between denominations, Rabbi Goldstein said, "but the power of Torah is that it can bring us together.

"We do not have to agree with each other, but we can study together. Pluralism means that there is not only a multiplicity of students, but there is also a multiplicity of teachers."

When she approached the three rabbis about participating in the evening, they all said yes immediately, Rabbi Goldstein said. "They knew that serious text study takes place at Kolel and they were excited about taking part."

An evening such as this will help people understand each other, she said. "So many people hate us; we cannot afford to hate each other. We must stand united as a community."

ANNOUNCEMENT

We wish to inform the Jewish community that until further notice, Benjamin's will withhold its daily advertisement from the Births & Deaths page of The Toronto Star. Families may continue to place notices in the obituary listings of any newspaper in Toronto. Full details of all Benjamin's funeral arrangements, shivas and unveilings will appear in The National Post and our website (www.benjamins.ca).

This decision is based on what we believe to be The Toronto Star's biased language and coverage of the conflict in the Middle East. We believe that the reporting and opinion columns try to 'balance' two sides of the story without sufficient depth to achieve journalism's ideals of truth and justice. This in our view makes The Toronto Star complicit in anti-Israel and anti-Semitic attitudes and actions towards the Jewish community in Toronto.

As long as The Toronto Star distorts the truth by equating the deaths of suicidal "martyrs" with those of the Israelis they kill, and as long as The Toronto Star allows its bias to incite hatred of the Jewish community in Toronto and The State of Israel, we will not support their advertising revenues.

As leaders with an 80-year heritage of serving the Jewish community, Benjamin's feels duty bound to resist all forms of hatred against our people.

We want to thank Steeles Memorial Chapel for joining us by also withdrawing their advertisment from The Toronto Star.

Protecting the historical record

On page one of this week's issue, Prof. Gil Troy urges Canadian Jews to maintain the momentum of our activism on behalf of Israel. The pro-Israel rallies that were held in various cities the past weeks should be, he says, but the beginning point, not the end point of our activities. The situation is urgent and demands vigilant, ongoing involvement.

One person who has demonstrated a unique and compelling activism on behalf of Israel is John Ross of Hamilton. In its last two issues, The CJN published Ross' two-part essay on the pivotal role played by Canadian Supreme Court Justice Ivan Rand in bringing about the UN General Assembly recommendation in 1947 for the partition of British Mandatory Palestine into Jewish and Arab states. As we know, the Jews accepted the recommendation; the Arabs did not.

Rand not only resisted the preferences of Canada and the United Kingdom to "simply amend the terms of the British Mandate," he actually persuaded a majority of the members on the United Nations Special Committee on Palestine (UNSCOP) to recommend partition of the disputed territory.

Ross deserves the community's gratitude. His original, painstaking research is invaluable for a number of reasons, most important of which is as a bulwark of truth against the frequent attempts, such as the one he described in the introductory paragraphs of his essay, to ignore or distort the integrity of the historical record. For the assault on the historical record, on truth itself, is intrinsic to the assault on the Jewish state.

The Israel Defence Forces' incursion into Jenin and the UN's decision to investigate the battle is a paradigm of that double assault.

After the more than week-long battle in Jenin and the surrender by the remaining terrorists, the Palestinian leadership shouted "massacre," "war crimes" and "atrocities." The UN was receptive to the accusations, echoed the Palestinian sentiments and decided an investigation was in order.

As these words are being written, Israel is embroiled with the UN in a dispute over the terms of reference and the composition of that investigation.

Some civilians, alas, were killed in Jenin. But their deaths fall squarely on the shoulders of the terrorists and their leaders who chose deliberately to sacrifice innocent civilians in the battle against Israel. There was no massacre. There were no war crimes. There were no atrocities. The truth is that the IDF did all it reasonably could to avoid civilian deaths.

Given its recent history, there is very little reason to believe that the UN is actually interested in getting at the truth or in preserving the integrity of the historical record. Ironically and sadly, that task too, along with the responsibility of protecting its own people, has also fallen to Israel.

Applauds Benjamin's 1

I am writing about Benjamin's announcement in your April 25 issue that, until further notice, it will withhold its daily advertisement from the Toronto Star over the newspaper's biased coverage of the Mideast conflict.

I fervently hope that our Jewish community will take heed. I honour Benjamin's well-founded wishes and I admire, respect and laud their eloquent input.

Applauds Benjamin's 2

It is highly honourable that the Benjamin and Levitt families have put principle above "just doing business." As a family, we have not been reading the Toronto Star for a good period of time for the same reason, because of the newspaper's biased coverage of the Middle East. In fact, we feel is almost our duty to become supporters of the National Post as people concerned about Canadian Jewry and the State of Israel.

The Jewish community could and should use whatever economic clout it has and become even more deeply involved in political activism.

An open letter to Canadian Jewry

Thank you to all who showed your support by making the effort to come to the rally on Parliament Hill, Sunday, April 21.

Your presence helped strengthen our collective voice by sending a strong message to all Canadians that we stand in solidarity with Israel, now and forever.

Our community alone could not have accomplished the mammoth feat without your assistance. Together we made a difference.

A wake-up call

Rachael Turkienicz's article in the April 18 issue of The CJN ("How do we respond?") articulated in a profoundly moving way the helpless anxiety and sadness that many of us have been feeling over recent events in Israel and throughout the Jewish world.

For many of us postwar Jewish baby boomers who have never known a world without our Jewish State, the past months have been a wake-up call. That we Jews have to change our complacent attitudes regarding Israel and our Judaism was made clear to me by an uplifting experience after the recent Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations. As I boarded a bus with my son and daughter who happened to be carrying an Israeli flag, an elderly frail-looking gentleman took the cloth of my daughter's flag in his hands and kissed it. That he did this, treating the flag of our Jewish State as one would a Sefer Torah or mezuzah, moved me to tears. It is an image that will stay with me forever. This man obviously remembered a world without a Jewish State and treated its symbol, the beautiful blue and white, with a reverence normally reserved for holy objects. So should we all. If we continue to take the existence of our Jewish country for granted as we have for so many years, we will be doing so at our peril.

Just returned from Israel

We have just returned from a solidarity mission to Israel. What we found there were empty streets, closed stores and hotels and a population of "shut-ins" who carry on with their chores while living with the fear that the most innocent activity – buying groceries, sitting in a café, taking a bus to school – could be their last. We heard two things continuously: 1. Why have the Jews of North America abandoned us? Why aren't they coming to support us? and 2. Why are governments (such as the government of Canada) who supported the war on terrorism in Afghanistan silent about terrorism when it comes to Israel? We urge all CJN readers to rethink their travel plans for the coming year and go to Israel where their presence and support is needed, and to write to their government representatives to demand that Canada take a stand against the teaching and perpetrating of hatred that is rampant in the Palestinian Authority communities.

We are Israel.
It isn't a place on a map.
It isn't a land marked by geographic boundaries.
It isn't a country with a language and an army.
We are Israel.
It is a place in our hearts.
It is the geography of our dreams and our prayers.
It is the country that we inhabit with our souls.
We are Israel.
To not forget is not enough.
We must learn how to stand together,
How to bear the burden that we share
Because
We are Israel.

An open letter to students

By RUTH WISSE

Although bashing Israel has been a popular campus activity since the rise of student radicalism in the late 1960s, during the past year, some Harvard University students have noted an increase of anti-Israel bias inside the classroom.

A professor calls Israel an "apartheid" country, perpetuating the Zionist-racist calumny that corrupted the United Nations for 15 years. Another holds Israel responsible for the aggression against it, while teaching assistants routinely manifest their bias instead of presenting critically balanced analysis. These are only some of the anguished laments I have been hearing from Jewish and other students who identify with Israel's cause.

As citizens of the free world, let alone members of the university community, students ought to do everything possible to challenge systematic prejudice and bias. But what can they do? The right of free speech is so rightfully enshrined in our culture, most especially at the university, that one hesitates to complain about professors who may be abusing their privilege. Students, having less information than their teachers, feel handicapped in arguing for what they know to be true, and they often hesitate to challenge those who determine their grades. Nevertheless, students are never powerless; indeed, they have the responsibility to seek out the truth and to affirm it. Let me suggest some ways they may begin correcting distortion – within the classroom and also beyond it.

Maps: 1. Have a reliably scaled map of the entire Middle East in view during any discussion of the Arabs and Israel. You may ask for such a map to be provided by the teacher, or distribute it on your own. Since the map shows that Israel takes up about one per cent of the region – about the proportion of Rhode Island to the United States – the complaint against Israel is easily turned back against those who question its expanse: how much less land do the Jews deserve compared to the vast holdings of the Arabs? The Arabs have 21 countries, Islam rules in 40. Why, then, accuse the Jews of having too much when the Arabs consider all they have is still too little? Why does their obsession with the tiny Jewish enclave prevent them from attending to the manifold problems of their own societies?

2. Have on hand a 1921-23 map of Great Britain's division of the mandated area of "Palestine." (I put Palestine in quotation marks because at the time, most Muslim and Christian Arabs considered the whole area called Palestine to be part of Arab Syria, and recognized no separate national identity among Syrian, Jordanian, or Palestinian Arabs.) The area assigned by Britain to the Hashemite rulers of Jordan was twice as large as that originally designated for the Jewish national home, but whereas Jews were barred from settling in Transjordan, Arabs remained free to settle in Eretz Yisrael. This map makes it clear that Jordan represented the lion's share of historical Palestine; indeed, the majority of Jordan is still made up of Palestinian Arabs, just as the majority of Palestinian Arabs reside in Jordan. How is it, then, that those who question the Jews' right to their part of Palestine do not simultaneously challenge Jordan's right to the Arab part of Palestine? The map highlights the scandal that Arab refugees were not settled in that abundant land just as Jewish refugees from Arab lands were resettled in Jewish Palestine.

3. Have in view a political map of the Middle East that is colour-coded according to levels of democracy and autocracy. That tiny blue patch of Israel hemmed in by shades of purple will show that the war against the Jewish State is simultaneously a war against the region's only democracy. Of course, a professor may want to present the case against democracy as well as for it. Arab governments' opposition to democracy within their borders is for them to determine. But any criticism of Israeli democracy within the context of Mideast politics is subject to strict comparative standards, or else it is merely an excuse to delegitimize the Jewish people.

Ruth Wisse

4. Have on hand a map of the world. See how many lands Christians and Muslims consider themselves entitled to, while the (older) religious civilization of the Jews is still expected to justify its claim to a small part of its ancient homeland.

Demographics: Keep on hand a chart of population statistics to register the preposterous imbalance of the so-called Arab-Israel conflict. There are presently about 13 million Jews in the world, four or five million fewer than there were in 1939, while there are more than 250 million Arabs with ties to more than one billion Muslims worldwide.

Since Judaism predates Islam by some 2,200 years, this asymmetry obviously attests to opposing religious priorities – self-limiting in one case, expansionist in the other. The Jews' concept of election puts enormous pressure on them to try to live up to the measure of God – a moral outlook that does not tempt many converts and has made Jews notoriously susceptible to political defeat. By contrast, Islam is a religion that affirms itself through conquest. Along with its humanitarian and spiritual teachings, the sword is one of its proudest symbols, and the current effort to increase its numbers, including in America, is part of this drive for universal reach.

Is there anything wrong with that? Perhaps not. Cultures are different, which is undoubtedly why Harvard places such emphasis on diversity, so that we may learn to recognize differences among people without seeking to destroy them on account of their difference. But why then should Islam's drive for hegemonic rule be credited over the Jewish people's struggle for survival?

Thanks to the lopsided ratio of the two parties, only the Arabs can bring peace to the Middle East, and only if and when they accept that Jews are also entitled to their land.

Historical timetables: While history cannot be summarized in charts, a reliable chronological timetable helps to counter disinformation by keeping the sequence of events firmly in view.

History records that the United Nations voted for the partition of Palestine on Nov. 29, 1947: the Jews accepted it, the Arabs did not. Israel declared its independence on May 14, 1948. Five Arab countries invaded Israel, vowing, in the words of the Secretary-General of the Arab League, that "this will be a war of extermination and a momentous massacre which will be spoken of like the Mongolian massacres and the Crusades."

The Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) was formed under the auspices of the Arab League in the summer of 1964, when the west bank of the Jordan River was under Hashemite control. The PLO's purpose must have been to "liberate" all of Israel, since the west bank was then under Arab control. Since Israel's conquest of what was formerly the west bank of the Jordan in 1967 was the result of the Arab war against the Jewish state, the so-called occupation of those disputed territories cannot retroactively have become its cause.

The Arab refusal to settle the Palestinians, or to let part of Jordan evolve into a Palestinian state, cannot be recycled as a charge against the Jewish people, except by willful distortion of the historical record. While there may be legitimate disputes over the interpretation of one or another event, there can unfortunately be no dispute about the escalation of Arab violence against the Jews of Palestine between 1921 and the present.

Sources: Although teachers may assign books exclusively hostile to Israel, you are free to explore the other side of the story. To see how widespread the problem Harvard students may be facing is, read Martin Kramer's Ivory Towers on Sand: The Failure of Middle Eastern Studies in America. Bernard Lewis' most recent book, What Went Wrong: Western Impact and Middle Eastern Responses offers a terse, deeply knowledgeable historical analysis of his subject. The Complete Idiot's Guide to the Middle East Conflict also serves the needs of intelligent and knowledgeable readers. Its bibliography and list of Web sites encourages further independent research.

Students who wish to defend Israel sometimes think they are engaged in a parochial cause that concerns them only because they are Jewish, or because they have Jewish sympathies or Jewish friends. But in fact, their fellow students may be afraid to stand up for the Jews because of the enormity, intensity, and ubiquity of the propaganda against them. This is as true today as it was in the 1930s and for many of the same reasons. Aggression against the Jews is the common denominator of many of the greatest tyrannies of the modern age, and the epidemic of anti-Semitism among the Arabs is all-too-disturbing evidence of the drift of their political culture.

Anti-Semitism is one of the world's most powerful ideologies because of the way it unites otherwise warring and opposing factions, such as radical Islamists and Arab nationalists, just as it united Communist and Arab regimes during the Cold War. Yet the more intractable the war against the Jews, the more some people are tempted to pressure Israel to yield to its enemies, since they believe the Arabs will never yield and, therefore, see no other solution but to ask for Jewish concessions. The ultimate outcome of such pressure on the Jews would be the destruction of their polity and population. And those who join in the assault, for whatever reason, bear responsibility for its acceleration.

To be sure, those who blame Israel for the aggression against it usually deny they are anti-Jewish. They say they are merely anti-Israel and anti-Zionist, not against the Jewish people. But as Hillel Halkin sums it up in the February 2002 issue of Commentary, "Israel is the state of the Jews. Zionism is the belief that the Jews should have a state. To defame Israel is to defame the Jews. To wish that it never existed, or would cease to exist, is to wish to destroy the Jews."

This syllogism should be borne in mind by those who help to prosecute the Arab war against the homeland of the Jewish people, for unlike Christianity and Islam, the Jews claim only a single land, one of the smallest on the globe.

Modern anti-Semitism since the 1860s has attacked the Jews because they are the emblem of democratic freedoms. Hence, by the logic of politics, defenders of Jewish rights, whether against the political left or right, are invariably defending the causes of liberty and toleration.

A problem that won't go away

It seems that these last weeks I did not have to read the newspapers – I was able to anticipate what was in them. Inevitably, they told me that Israel had done this or that – made incursions into Palestinian territory or had withdrawn from it. The headlines always suggested either one of two things: that Israel was aggressive, or that it was retreating from its incursions because of world opinion. Emphasis was always on what it did or did not do rather than on what was being done to it that might have caused its reactions.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

This imbalance of reporting is not new. Israel has never been a favourite of the journalistic clan, which has the uncanny habit of emphasizing the country's actions in such a way as to portray it, directly or indirectly, as the cause of all the trouble in the Middle East.

Arabic writers have long ago pointed this out. According to them, there would be no trouble in the Middle East, or anywhere perhaps, if it were not for the presence of Israel. Israel's refusal to dissolve itself and disappear from existence has been, according to them, the main reason for trouble in the Middle East. Since trouble there has affected many parts of the western world, some people believe that most of the trouble we are experiencing is due to Israel. Just how is not necessarily specified, but it sounds good to our enemies.

The fact that in most of the incidents reported, Israel is the victim and not the aggressor has spawned the odd charge that the victim is to blame for the problem.

That spurious argument could be stated a little differently, but just as cogently.

If Jews were not in existence, there would be no anti-Semitism. Based on this proposition, the conclusion is obvious: it is the Jews who are responsible for the persecution they have suffered.

A similar argument states there would be no Israel problem if Israel did not exist. Its coming into existence is its sin, and as long as it exists it will have to be punished for being alive. If Israel would disappear, we would be rid not only of it, but of its troubles.

Israel, of course, refuses to agree to its own disappearance. It has the chutzpah of wanting to stay alive, and those who wish it ill feel that this is its primary sin.

Well, Israel will have to keep on sinning in this regard, and I for one, belong with the majority of my co-religionists, and the not-insubstantial number of Israel's friends and admirers who also refuse to accede to its disappearance.

Dear Friends

Distressed by two letters to the National Post (April 5) from the heads of the Anglican Church and the United Church, I wrote to both of them. Part of my letter follows.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

"To the Most Reverend Michael Peers, Primate, Anglican Church of Canada and to Rev. Dr. Marion Pardy, Moderator of the United Church of Canada:

"Your letters of April 5 appeared in the National Post under the headline 'Churches identify root causes of uprising.'

"I was pleased to see that you so easily grasp the nettle of misery in the Arab-Israeli conflict. Unfortunately, you are wrong on many counts.

"I am amazed at how you, Rev. Peers, so glibly quoted a passage from Jeremiah, 'They have treated the wound of my people carelessly, saying "peace, peace," when there is no peace,' as if Israel had no wounds, and had not for years sought peace with the Palestinian people. Here are three questions which I ask both of you to ponder.

"1. Why did you not write equally passionately about homicide bombings when they began, and when Israeli men, women and children going about their civilian lives were literally torn apart by bombers?

"2. Can you recount for me how many peace demonstrations have taken place in the Palestinian areas, and in fact anywhere in the Arab world either before Oslo, since [former prime minister] Yitzhak Rabin was assassinated, or since 2000 when the bombings began? Or ever?

"3. When living in the Middle East – which I assume both of you have done for long periods of time, learning both Hebrew and Arabic – did you encounter Israelis and Palestinians being business partners, shopping and visiting parks together, worshipping the same God? You could have, before the latest uprising.

"Look carefully – you will see Palestinian textbooks that praise armed struggle, and none that praise peace with Israel – or even acknowledge it as a possibility. The Palestinians have been cowed by the corruption of the Palestinian Authority [PA]. Why are there still refugee camps in Palestinian territory years after Palestinians have taken control of those areas? Should the camps not have been demolished and normal homes built, fruitful industries begun for their inhabitants? No, the PA has chosen the opposite strategy: not to make those refugees want peace, but to make their lives such misery that they will turn against the Israelis.

"The Palestinians have been conned – Israel will not disappear, nor can all refugees return to the state, just as Jews from Arab lands cannot reclaim their property. International law recognizes compensation and so Israel offers. Palestinians have been convinced that Jews are blood-drinking swine, by their media and by their elite: have you spoken out against this left-over myth from the Dark Ages?

"The settlements are a thorn in all sides. But they are not the cause of the conflict. The cause is the unrelenting refusal of the Palestinian people to accept the State of Israel. Israelis did not dance in the streets on Sept. 11, but Arabs did. Deceived as they are, your quick acceptance of all their grievances and rejection of Israel's rights does nothing to recover a balance for peace.

"If you wrote about suicide bombings, please send me copies of your letters and I will publish them in my monthly column for the Canadian Jewish News. If you can give me the dates of Palestinian peace demonstration (one recent one in Jerusalem by Israelis had 10,000 people at it), I will publish them. If you both have lived in the Middle East and talked with Israelis and Palestinians of all stripes, then I will be pleased to hear about your lives there. Dr. Pardy, Israel is still willing to negotiate and end to the conflict. Is Arafat?

"It has taken me longer to buy a carpet in the market than it did Arafat to walk away from the negotiating table. What Palestinians needed was not teenage homicidal maniacs. They needed, as [Middle East historian] Bernard Lewis put it, to realize that 'the age of martial valour in holy war had ended; the time had come for the solid, bourgeois virtues of industry, skill and thrift needed in the hard, unglamorous, but urgent task of developing the country and raising the standard of living of her people.'

"That task is boring and unglamorous and absolutely necessary if suffering is to end.

"Two final questions: Can Arafat and his minions do it? Do they want to?"

E-mail: The next best thing to being there

I have three e-mail accounts: one at work, one at a home, and a Hotmail account.

My office e-mail is reserved for correspondence and files pertaining to my job. I use my home e-mail account for personal projects, communication with friends and relatives, and volunteer work.

Stuart Slayen in Winnipeg

For years, I've had a free Hotmail account that I have grown to hate. It used to be my primary account. Today, for every e-mail I get from someone I know, I get at least 30 notes advertising get-rich-quick schemes, pornography, get-rich-slow schemes, weight loss programs (I guess those direct marketers have done some homework!), debt consolidation programs, get-rich-at-a-moderate-pace schemes, credit card offers and other trash that I delete before I finish reading the subject line.

Lately, my personal mailboxes have been filling up with all sorts of communication about the current crisis in the Middle East.

I received one e-mail explaining how to complain – by e-mail of course – to the New Democratic Party about its baffling behaviour on the Middle East. Another note carried a link to a powerful Jerusalem Post article by Limor Livnat, Israel's education minister. (At first, I didn't pay much attention to this message, because I had only received it from three different people.)

I got a few e-mails about a Belgian Web site gathering first names of Israel supporters and the cities they live in for an advertising campaign (if you see "Stu from Winnipeg" in a Brussels newspaper, that's me). According to the Web site's counter, nearly 918,000 people have visited so far.

Another e-mail reported an alleged and damning conversation between an Israeli and CNN correspondent Andrea Koppel. There were also a handful of "open letters" to the world, forceful fact sheets about Middle East history and a disturbing PowerPoint presentation about how Palestinian children learn to hate Israel from an early age (complete with the dramatic sounds of gunfire and disquieting images of mutilated bodies).

One thing these e-mails share in common is the invitation to forward the note to others. At first, I was impressed and heartened by the strength and length of these electronic chains. It was exciting to see the long lists of e-mail addresses that preceded mine.

At first, I read each e-mail and dutifully forwarded it to a few friends and relatives. After a few days of receiving pro-Israel e-mails, I would forward them without reading them. But I confess that my enthusiasm for forwarding and reading these notes has faded in recent days.

While I believe that sharing information and lobbying are important, I fear that the composition and distribution of e-mail messages might replace traditional advocacy and community-building in the eyes of too many people.

Demonstrating support for Israel via e-mail is easy. Perhaps too easy. It is critical that we use e-mail to enhance – not replace – other action. The fact 918,000 people have visited a pro-Israel Web site on the strength of e-mail messages is great. In my mind, though, the more important numbers are the 25,000 Israel supporters who rallied on Parliament Hill; the 1,500 who sang Am Yisrael Chai at the Manitoba Legislature; and the 800 who gathered at Queen's Park.

The number of people who send and receive PowerPoint presentations by e-mail is less important than the number of people who open some books (remember them?) about Jewish and Israeli history; gather at Jewish events in Jewish buildings and public places; engage Arab Canadians in dialogue; contribute financially; and visit Israel.

Sharing information by e-mail is useful and it will become increasingly so. And, yes, e-mail has the power to build community. But e-advocacy is still unproven and the Internet tolerates a whole lot of nonsense. For the pro-Israel messages to resonate above the cacophony of ads, myths, hoaxes, shtick and tricks, the messages need to be put into perspective.

So go ahead and click, double click, reply, forward and send. But don't miss the rally.

The Kirshner File

Assessing the outcome of Defensive Shield

Israel officially completed Operation Defensive Shield – its biggest ground offensive in 20 years – on April 21, and then redeployed, but did not fully withdraw, from Palestinian autonomous areas.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Israel reoccupied six of eight towns and many more villages in Area A – comprising 18 per cent of the West Bank – after a succession of Palestinian suicide bombings and shootings. The terrorist campaign, capped by the March 27 Passover massacre in Netanya, triggered the sweep, whose broad objective was to cripple the Palestinian Authority's (PA) infrastructure of terrorism. The three-week offensive was supported by the vast majority of Israelis, who could no longer tolerate the daily carnage that claimed the lives of 126 civilians and soldiers in March alone.

From one perspective, the operation was a success. Israel killed 35 key organizers and planners, and numerous perpetrators, of Palestinian attacks, including Qis Adwan, the architect of the Netanya bombing. Israel also rounded up leaders, principally Fatah's Marwan Barghouti, and established a clear connection between the PA's intelligence apparatus and a web of terrorist cells. In addition, Israel seized caches of weapons and explosive belts worn by suicide bombers and blew up dozens of bomb-making workshops.

Gen. Shaul Mofaz, Israel's chief of staff, had said the offensive would last up to two months, and Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon had indicated it would leave no "seed of terror behind." Yet, under American pressure, brought on by Arab and European indignation, Israel was forced to wind up Operation Defensive Shield much earlier.

Sharon, who has not ruled out major thrusts into Hebron and the Gaza Strip, which were left untouched by the massive incursion, knows that the Palestinians will soon regroup and renew their attacks. Thus, within a week of Israel's redeployment, Hamas attacked Adora, a West Bank settlement, killing four civilians, and the Israeli army resurrected its policy of pinprick strikes against militants from the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

By early this week, in defiance of United Nations resolutions and U.S. and European demands, Israeli forces continued to encircle Palestinian cities like Nablus and Jenin, where the fiercest battles took place. On April 28, Israel agreed to left the siege around PA Chairman Yasser Arafat's battered compound in Ramallah – whose offices contain, among others, the suspected assassins of Israeli cabinet minister Rechavam Ze'evi – and set him free. But Israel was still besieging the Church of the Nativity in Bethlehem, filled with some 30 gunmen.

Due to Israel's continuing presence in Area A, which is supposed to be under full Palestinian control under the Oslo accords, the Palestinians rejected a ceasefire proposal by U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell.

With Operation Defensive Shield formally finished, at least for now, Sharon reiterated his intention to build a buffer zone along much of Israel's border with the West Bank. Designed to protect Israelis from terrorism, it is expected to cost $800 million, take about a year to construct, consist of a mix of fences and sensors, and will be policed by mobile patrols.

It remains to be seen whether the buffer zone, which would resemble the existing one cutting the Gaza Strip off from Israel, will be the first step toward an Israeli declaration of unilateral separation, a concept vehemently opposed by Jewish settlers in the territories. In any event, most Israelis realize that a strictly military solution cannot provide a definitive answer to the twin problems of Palestinian militancy and terrorism.

By all accounts, Operation Defensive Shield shattered the PA. Sharon, having characterized the PA as a terrorist kingdom, had made no secret of his desire to eradicate it. Some observers claim that Sharon, under the guise of uprooting terrorism, a clear and present danger, deliberately laid waste to the PA, leaving behind "a landscape of devastation," as a New York Times correspondent succinctly put it. Government buildings were pummelled, official documents and computer hard drives were removed, water mains were destroyed and electricity pylons were downed.

Long before Operation Defensive Shield was launched, Israeli helicopters, jets, tanks and artillery, in numerous reprisal raids, had already wrecked a wide assortment of PA facilities, from jails and television and radio stations to Gaza's airport and nascent port.

It appears that the PA's economy, a vital component of which was tourism, especially in Bethlehem, has virtually ceased to function. In recent months, as closures kept Palestinian workers out of Israel, real income fell and the unemployment rate rose, causing still more deprivation and misery and sowing the seeds of both Islamic and secular radicalism. "Belief in the path of jihad is growing stronger," Ha'aretz recently quoted a senior Israeli army officer as saying.

Western donors, including the United States and Canada, have pledged to rebuild the PA. But if Israelis are tormented by further acts of Palestinian terrorism, which will doubtless be the case, Israel will retaliate, and the PA will be sent reeling back to square one.

It is clear that Operation Defensive Shield, far from isolating Arafat, has reinforced his stature. Arafat, whose popularity had waned in the face of widespread corruption and a lack of improvement in the standard of living, is probably as popular today as he was when he returned to Gaza in triumph in July 1994.

Sharon, having branded Arafat as "irrelevant" and as an "enemy," does not regard him as a partner and refuses to deal with him. Sharon hopes that a "responsible and moderate" Palestinian leadership will displace Arafat and company. But it is a forlorn hope, grounded in illusion. Neither the United States and the Europeans, nor the Arab world, have written off Arafat, the ultimate survivor.

Furthermore, Powell has warned Sharon not to try to exile Arafat. Unless Israel sends Arafat packing, Israel is stuck with him, just as Israel had no alternative but to negotiate with the PLO.

Although Operation Defensive Shield was applauded by most Israelis, it has tarnished Israel, particularly in Europe. In a startling reversal of fortunes, Israel's image as a victim of terrorism has been transformed into that of an aggressor guilty of committing a massacre in the Jenin refugee camp, a hotbed of Palestinian nationalism and the incubator of 23 suicide bombers. In this sense, the sweep has been a public relations disaster for Israel.

At the United Nations, European countries, joined by the United States, voted for several resolutions calling for Israel's immediate withdrawal from Area A. European Union foreign ministers rejected a proposal to scrap the EU's free trade agreement with Israel, but Israel is on notice that further incursions may have grave consequences. And in a disturbing sign of the times, Germany – Israel's best friend after the United States – imposed a temporary arms embargo on Israel, delaying by weeks the delivery of Merkava tank parts.

Gen. Shaul Mofaz

In general, the European press has lambasted Israel's incursion, and polls suggest that public opinion has swung behind the Palestinians in France, Britain and Italy.

And in what may be a harbinger of Israel's political isolation, Niger – a mainly Muslim backwater in Africa – severed diplomatic relations with Israel last week in support of the Palestinians.

In particular, Israel's image has been bruised by its destruction of a small swath of the Jenin refugee camp, a nest of hard-core terrorism. In all probability, Israel could have saved the lives of 23 of its own soldiers had it attacked the camp from the air. Instead, to minimize civilian casualties and property damage, Israel opted for a dangerous house-to-house assault. The Palestinians described their resistance in Jenin in heroic language, but strangely enough, labelled Israel's thrust into the camp as an outright massacre.

Terje Roed-Larsen, the United Nation's special representative in the Middle East, denounced the events in Jenin as "shocking beyond belief" and "morally indefensible." His comments, which caused an uproar in Israel, led to the formation of a UN investigation panel, but not, as the Palestinians had hoped, to an international peacekeeping force.

Operation Defensive Shield somewhat dented Israel's pivotal relationship with the United States, but also hardened the Bush administration's generally dubious view of Arafat and his commitment to a settlement.

Massive Arab television coverage deepened Arab hostility to Israel. Egypt downgraded diplomatic relations with Israel and temporarily halted Air Sinai flights to and from Tel Aviv. King Abdullah II of Jordan came under similar pressure to sever ties with Israel. Judging by the comments of Egypt's foreign minister, the consensus in Arab capitals is that Israel is sabotaging efforts to reach a ceasefire with the PA, and that the Palestinians have a right to resist Israel's occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Politically, then, Operation Defensive Shield has backfired on Israel, which, given the harsh realities in the world, is not all that surprising.

'IN SEARCH OF PEACE: 1948-1967'

This is an absorbing and inspirational film with tremendous archival footage which sorts through and clarifies the complexities of Middle East diplomacy. This film was produced by the Simon Wiesenthal Centre and is narrated by Michael Douglas.

The film is preceded by commentary by Gerald Ziedenberg.

'IN SEARCH OF PEACE: 1948-1967' chronicles the first two decades of Israel's existence, offering new insights on the origins of the Middle East conflict. It weaves together historical narrative, anecdotes and dramatic personal stories, drawing on interviews with the leaders who helped make that history. The film offers a unique global perspective on one of the most important events of the twentieth century and one of the seminal events in the 3500 year history of the Jewish people.

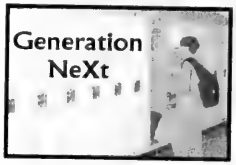
Am Yisrael Chai

By MARK DANIELS AND JASON ROTSTEIN

My experience with Israel has been a journey of discovery. The road has been lined with realizations about the world, about people, about myself. Feelings of obligation grew as I did, and my ties with Israel matured with my sense of responsibility to my other homeland.

But the one part of the journey that has stood out above all, and will continue to do so for as long as I live, came at the recent pro-Israel rally in Washington, D.C. There, my awakening peaked, and my journey stopped being a journey of the self as I realized that my feelings are shared by countless others.



I stepped off the Washington subway as an individual, ready to show my support for Israel. I returned to the subway as part of something greater, knowing that I was part of a solution, no longer an inactive bystander watching from a distance.

As I listened to speaker after speaker, my pride in Israel grew. And as the crowd poured onto Capitol Hill – an endless stream of our people joined by a common cause and an unbreakable will – I knew Israel would never stand alone.

I can't fully describe the rally to you here. It was one of those things that can't be accurately expressed with words, if only for a lack of appropriate vocabulary to convey certain emotions. But what I witnessed that day was nothing short of remarkable.

The crowd's undying faith in the State of Israel overcame any feelings of concern for the future of the Jewish homeland. That entire afternoon, I saw an extraordinary display of determination, surpassed only by limitless inner strength. It was that strength in the face of extreme adversity that has remained firmly embedded in my memory. The experience put everything into a new, unmistakable perspective.

Everywhere I looked, I saw an army of my brothers, hundreds of thousands of patriots bursting with pride in Israel, wearing blue and white flags and Israel Defence Forces T-shirts. That's when I realized that while Israel may be, for some, a small country 5,000 miles away, one whose very existence is constantly threatened by the presence of Goliaths on each of its borders, Israel is really wherever we are. And that is why, when we have faced impossible odds time and time again, Israel has never fallen. Israel will always live on in each and every one of us, and that strength can never be overcome. Am Yisrael chai!

Temple Kol Ami to get its own permanent home

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN — After 13 years, Temple Kol Ami is well on its way to having its own home.

The congregation is currently housed at Leo Baeck Day School on Atkinson Avenue in Thornhill, but it has purchased land on Dufferin Street just north of Highway 7, and is planning to break ground in two to three years.

At a fund-raising dinner planned for May 26, the temple, which has a membership of about 240 families, is honouring Elinor Caplan, member of Parliament for Thornhill.

Rabbi Daniel Komito-Gottlieb, spiritual leader of Temple Kol Ami for the past six years, said he worked with 12 founding families to establish the temple when he was director of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism.

"The Jewish community in York region was growing rapidly but there was no Reform congregation to serve the area. These families were looking for a family-oriented congregation with a strong sense of community.

"They also wanted a fully egalitarian, welcoming congregation so that people who were returning to Judaism could feel at home. They've never looked back," he said.

Part of the congregation's success, said Rabbi Komito-Gottlieb, is that its members "live the values of Torah in its religious and its day-to-day life. Tikkun olam is one of the core values of our congregation."

Among its community work, the congregation has volunteers that work every second Sunday on a street help van, help out at food banks, conduct a food drive, run programs at Cheltenham Nursing Home, and take part in fund-raising walks.

The new building is intended to be a full-service centre that will include a synagogue, school and preschool, Rabbi Komito-Gottlieb said.

"It is an exciting time to be a rabbi. There is a general level of excitement in the congregation.

"It is a volunteer-led congregation, and all aspects of the land acquisition was done by members. There was a tremendous level of co-operation to make this happen," said Rabbi Komito-Gottlieb.

For information on the fund-raising dinner honouring Elinor Caplan, call the temple at 905-709-2620.

Architect Jack Diamond (left) shows a slide demonstrating how different models of synagogues/parliament buildings encourage and/or discourage democratic participation. [Jennifer Paquette photos]

Shul architecture mirrors Jewish experience

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — What makes synagogues architecturally unique? Nothing, says Jack Diamond, since synagogues borrow from the styles and cultural motifs of their surrounding societies.

But, said Diamond, one of Canada's leading architects and the designer of Jerusalem's new City Hall, this lack of style reflects deeper truths about Jewish buildings.

While other faiths' places of worship assume an "inevitable" authenticity through antiquity, size, location, and aesthetics, the rules don't apply to synagogues, Diamond told a recent symposium on shul architecture.

"Judaism defies inevitability," he said. Believing "the soul has no locus… [Jews] do not seek authenticity in place."

Diamond joined fellow architect Sheldon Levitt, psychiatrist Vivian Rakoff and Rabbi Lawrence Pinsker at Congregation Darchei Noam early last month for a gathering entitled Building Synagogues: Architecture and Jewish Experience, part of Darchei Noam's ongoing adult education series and funded in part by a grant from the Jewish Reconstructionist Federation's Yad Mordecai Keren Torah fund.

Rakoff, a professor emeritus of psychiatry at the University of Toronto, described the synagogues of his South African childhood, ranging from a living-room minyan to the majestic Gardens Shul in Cape Town. The latter, "modelled after the cathedral of Vilna, Lithuania," symbolized in a way no "Jewish" design ever could the immigrants' "hope for an end to centuries of oppression," Rakoff said.

Despite this, Rakoff said, even the grandest of shuls are "corks bobbing on the open waters of history" and are eventually cast aside.

Levitt's presentation underscored this ephemerality with a slide-show sampling of photographs from his 1986 book, Treasures of a People: The Synagogues of Canada. Many are no longer sacred spaces – Levitt showed one beautiful former shul that was being used as a muffler warehouse.

On the issue of the ephemerality, Rakoff noted that Judaism is what anthropologists call a "non-embedded" society, one that is "based in portable symbols" – such as a Sefer Torah he recalled from a shul of his youth – "and, hence, cannot be destroyed." For Rakoff, a synagogue is not a place, but a function: a metaphor for the Jewish worship experience.

Synagogue as metaphor was also Rabbi Pinsker's message. Contrary to popular belief, Rabbi Pinsker said, the modern synagogue is modelled not after Greek or Egyptian places of worship, but on a far older archetype: the ancient city gate. In a complex of buildings outside the city, people would conduct civil and business transactions – and even religious events, such as when Ezra gathered the Jews there to learn Torah.

Reflecting "the functionality of everyday life," these gatehouses-as-sacred-spaces predated the Second Temple, offering a "universal, democratic and popular" means of approaching Jewish spirituality; one which Rabbi Pinsker said has, "throughout history, saved us from disappearing."

Levitt said this democratic spirit has become a significant modern trend.

His slide show documented the post-World War II transition from synagogues centred around sanctuaries to a model of synagogue as "campuses," with the sanctuary becoming only part of the synagogue as a whole. In other ways, as both Diamond and discussion moderator, architect Les Klein, showed, newer synagogues offer more inviting entranceways and increasingly offer physically-accessible worship spaces.

Yet, along with this openness, Rakoff said security has also become one of the primary concerns in synagogue architecture.

But Levitt noted that, "while important, security concerns are a slippery slope. There's no end to security… [but] we can't be afraid."

In turbulent times, noted the event's organizer, architect Ronni Rosenberg, the very act of building a synagogue is "perhaps the most optimistic statement any community can make." And no matter where a Jewish community dwells, Rabbi Pinsker said, "people are the centrepiece of any synagogue – they are there for the Torah."

Jewish Life

What they say and what they mean

By RABBI MENDEL KAPLAN

Rabbinic Reflections

After decades of being politically incorrect and unacceptable, old-fashioned anti-Semitism is making a comeback. Although "Nazi," "fascist," "bigot" and even "anti-Semite" are still dirty words, our enemies have renewed this age-old hatred by renaming it "pro-Palestinian" and "anti-Israeli." If the United Nations anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa, didn't make it clear enough six months ago, then the last few weeks in France, Tunisia, Berlin, Kiev and downtown Toronto should have.

From a Torah perspective, the skilful attempts made by anti-Semites to conceal the true nature of their vile intentions come as no surprise. According to the Kabbalah's teachings, naked evil never has any allure. To succeed, it must first cover its hideous face.

Adolf Hitler, for example, claimed to be saving his country and ridding the world of the worst diseases with his "Final Solution." Slobodan Milosevic still claims to be a patriotic defender of "glorious" Yugoslavian "values." And Osama bin Laden justifies his campaign of terror as righting the wrongs imposed by the western world upon his "unfortunate brethren."

Tragically, the pan-Arab visions for the future of Eretz Yisrael are no different. For most of the last century, they have tried to exterminate the Jews living in the Holy Land. After the formal declaration of a Jewish State, they initiated five wars, causing the deaths of thousands of Jews and Arabs. The PLO charter still calls for the total destruction of Israel.

Yet as all faithful adherents of true evil have always done, the honest intentions have been ingeniously disguised. Genocidal wishes veiled as an ardent desire to "resettle three million helpless refugees" by granting them the "right to return" or by liberating occupied "ancient" Palestinian land from an "alien" conqueror sound morally just and even meritorious. If the blowing up of Israelis were presented as an attempt to kill and maim as many Jews as possible, the civilized world might not accept it. Instead, it is presented as "an expression of the deepest frustrations of an unfairly oppressed people," and harvests an outpouring of sympathy for the perpetrators rather than the victims of this cold-blooded murder.

It is painful to see most of the civilized world rehabilitate their old animosities against the Jewish people. It is even more painful to see well-intentioned Jews unwittingly join them in the anti-Semitic fest – Jews who, in their passionate desire for peace, believe the brilliantly packaged PR proffered by these dictators and terrorists.

Don't despair. We have seen worse times and we shall overcome these newest travails as well. God will never forsake us. As He has miraculously sustained us through horrible and unimaginable times during the past 2,000 years of Galut, He will continue to preserve us. As King David states in the book of Psalms (94: 14), "Lo yitosh Hashem amo" (God will not abandon his people). However, that doesn't mean we should sit and wait to be attacked. The same Torah tells us that we must do our part with the greatest possible effort.

"Kivsah achat bein shivim zevim" (a lone sheep amongst 70 [hungry] wolves) is the Torah terminology used to characterize our tenuous existence. For six decades, the wolves have (relatively) been at bay. Now that traditional anti-Semitism has assumed this new countenance, we need to stop ignoring reality. The lower we lay, the more damage we allow. Anti-Semitism may be at our doorstep, but that doesn't mean we have to tolerate it. We need to educate ourselves, defend Israel and strip away the sophisticated veneer that Yasser Arafat and his ilk have painted. We need to engage our associates and friends, and if our attempts to educate prove unsuccessful, then we need to call it like it is.

By identifying this bigotry straightforwardly, we will, God-willing, succeed (if even modestly) in stemming the flow of venomous hatred. By continuing to exhibit Jewish pride and increase our Torah study and observance of mitzvot, we fulfil our mandate of being a "light unto the nations" and will, with God's help, merit Divine grace and deliverance with the arrival of the long-awaited Mashiach.

Rabbi Kaplan is the senior rabbi and spiritual leader of Chabad @ Flamingo in Thornhill, Ont.

Designer theft

By YISRAEL RUTMAN

Guest Voice

The sages of the Talmud knew all about the temptation to steal. Most people, they said, in one way or another, succumb to it. But even those insightful scholars may never have dreamed of the extent to which people would go in the most affluent society in history.

According to a recent report in the New York Times, the trendiest restaurants in America are constant targets of theft. Reporter Donna Paul interviewed dozens of restaurateurs and discovered that "from $3 water glasses to $1,200 silver ice buckets, from vintage photographs hanging on the walls to scented candles burning in the bathrooms, if it isn't nailed down, diners have walked off with it." In one Manhattan eatery, a designer sconce was ripped from the wall in the men's room during the dinner service.

People who are able to spend hundreds of dollars on a unique dining experience are obviously not poor. What is it, then, that emboldens some of them to take that enticing Peugeot pepper mill or a sample of the darling Frette linens? Well, as one customer said, "I rationalized that the restaurant probably had 200 of them," and so she swiped a little mother-of-pearl caviar spoon.

Of course, this line of thinking ultimately empties out the proprietor's inventory, not to mention his faith in humanity. It leads to the experience of the owners of one restaurant who hand-carried thousands of pieces of silverware from Italy and France, only to have all of them stolen over the years. Now they use second-rate imitations.

The service industry is taking countermeasures: the installation of surveillance cameras, the training of staff in professional vigilance, and, last but not least, the bolting and screwing down of anything of value aside from food and flatware.

Of course, all of this serves at best only to manage the problem. It does not solve it. Is there no way to teach people that stealing, in whatever form and for whatever reason, is wrong?

In a society whose traditional moral restraints have taken a back seat to the pursuit of material possessions, it is difficult to see how. Jewish tradition, however, does offer a solution: Lo Tignov, Thou Shalt Not Steal.

Only recognition of a God-given law that allows for no rationalizations or loopholes can ultimately curb the natural human tendency to covet what belongs to others. No system can work as effectively as the internal security system of knowing that we live under the surveillance of the Master of the Universe.

Such a recognition is inculcated by constant emphasis. The Torah's prohibition against theft is not only engraved on synagogue walls and read aloud each year from the Torah, it is engraved on Jewish hearts through education and example.

In a traditional Jewish educational system, the first exposure of a child to Talmud is the chapter of "These are the lost items," which concerns itself with the imperative to restore lost property to its rightful owner. Anyone taught from childhood the concept that God wishes him or her to locate a wallet's owner will not likely consider shoplifting an acceptable enterprise.

Meticulous honesty has always been an essential Jewish ideal. Abraham proclaimed that "I took nothing from a thread unto a shoelace" from the king of Sodom. Moses testified that he borrowed not even a donkey from the public trust. Jacob laboured for his father-in-law Laban, weathering the chill of night and the heat of day to earn his honest wages, despite Laban's having cheated his son-in-law "100 times over." Jacob could have rationalized, but he didn't. As King David wrote, "Who can ascend the holy mountain? He whose hands are clean [of theft]."

The only real solution to the breakdown of respect for the property of others may not be fashionable in these "God-neutral" times. But the experience of thousands of years have proven its efficacy. The only real way to combat designer theft is with designer obedience.

Monitoring the Mideast conflict

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The fighting in Israel and the West Bank has an offshoot – a battle over the world's electronic and print media. Sympathizers with the Israeli and Palestinian causes are keenly aware of how powerful the media are in shaping world opinion. So each side is using the Internet to make sure its message is getting across – while monitoring what the other side is saying. And because of the accessibility of the Internet, you also have the ability to survey news media from around the world – and monitor the war of words.

An excellent place to start browsing is at Journalismnet where you can get an immediate sampling of late-breaking Mideast stories as reported from around the world [http://www.journalismnet.com/newsfeeds/mideast/]. On one particular day, I found links to Mideast reports from the Norway Post, the Hindustan Times and New Zealand's Scoop. At the Israeldaily Web site, there were articles from many North American papers, along with links to pieces from Internet-based magazines such as Salon, as well as the Moscow Times, The Times of India and China's Xinhua News Agency ("Vietnamese Veterans Condemn Israel's Military Aggression"). [http://www.israeldaily.com] And if you prefer to skim through world media on your own, you can find an easy-to-navigate listing at Journalismnet.com [http://www.journalismnet.com/news/].

Because of the media's potential for influencing world opinion about the Mideast conflict, both sides have established media monitoring agencies. Honestreporting.com "monitors the international media for biased reports against Israel" [http://honestreporting.com/]. It also presents "awards" to highlight positive portrayals of Israel. Winners include the Atlantic Monthly, the National Post and columnist Charles Krauthammer. Palestine Media Watch (PMW) solicits volunteers to monitor and "protest the U.S. media's gross professional breach in covering the Palestinian-Israeli conflict." [http://pmwatch.org/pmw/] In addition to examples of reports that PMW feels illustrate how North America's media are skewed in favour of Israel, there is a section on letter-writing tips: "Avoid referring to supporters of Israel and the occupation as 'Jews,' 'the Jewish lobby,' or 'Jewish groups'... Instead, use terms like 'pro-Israel, pro-occupation activists,' or 'the pro-Israel lobby.' Doing so makes clear that you don't mean to attack Jews in general, and it also helps drive home the point that the pro-occupation groups don't speak for all Jews."

One particularly heated discussion in the media is over terminology such as how and when to use words like "terrorists" or "militants," especially after Sept. 11. In April, White House spokesperson Ari Fleischer opened a new debate when he began to use the phrase "homicide bombers" rather than "suicide bombers." "These are not suicide bombings," Fleisher explained. "These are not people who just kill themselves. These are people who deliberately go to murder others, with no regard to the values of their own life. These are murderers." [http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2002/04/20020412-1.html]

The Fox News Channel [http://www.foxnews.com/] and the New York Post [http://www.nypost.com/] are both using "homicide bomber," but most media have not switched. A recent AP story on this controversy quotes Bob Steele, director of the ethics program at the Poynter Institute for Media Studies. He says "homicide bomber" does not convey that the individual died in the attack. "To just switch the term, even though it is a homicide, does not resolve the challenge of being as specific as necessary." [http://shlk.com/61]

Although there are many Arabic English-language news Web sites available online [http://media.fares.net], Western readers are at a disadvantage when trying to understand how the conflict is being reported to speakers of Arabic. The Middle East Media Research Institute translates articles, reports and speeches from Arabic into English [http://memri.org/]. Lately the Institute made headlines when it publicized that the Saudi ambassador to Britain had composed a poem about suicide bombers. Ghazi Algosaibi's The Martyrs had been published in the London Arabic daily, Al-Hayat. Earlier this year, the Institute revealed that the Saudi government daily Al-Riyadh had reported stories about blood libels directed at Jews. The accusations in the articles were later retracted after they were reported worldwide.

What can our 'prophets' teach us?

The Jewish Prophet, Visionary Words from Moses and Miriam to Henrietta Szold and A. J. Heschel*, by Michael J. Shire, Jewish Lights, 2002, $25 (US)

Books
Bernard Baskin

Jewish history is rich with men and women of vision, courage, sagacity and idealism. The author of this handsome volume, vice-principal of the Leo Baeck College-Centre for Jewish Education in London, calls these personalities prophets. And he has brought together 30 of these moral and spiritual giants from ancient, medieval and modern sources, to look at what they can teach us in our own complex and troubled age.

The inspiring and challenging individuals range from such biblical figures as Amos, Isaiah, Micah and Jeremiah, to persons from the medieval period, including Isaac Abravanel, Manasseh ben Israel and Baruch Spinoza. From our own time, the author has selected, among others, Rabbi Abraham Kook, Stephen S. Wise, Martin Buber and Abraham Joshua Heschel.

The author is convinced that all of the men and women he has chosen spoke up bravely against the evil of their day, and some even risked their lives for the sake of truth. Each personality is introduced with a brief biographical sketch, emphasising moral and spiritual values, followed by excerpts from their thoughts and basic teachings.

The author writes, "Though rooted in their own time and political reality, these medieval and modern nevi'im [prophets] have given expression to sublime notions of freedom and justice. They call for individual liberty, democratic ideals and universal peace, ideas that have moulded the very nature of western civilization and its political, social and religious ideals."

The following three personalities are perhaps not as well known as most of the others. Dona Gracia Mendes (1510-1569) was born in Portugal and forced to live as a Marrano. She set up an underground "network" of agents in England, France and Germany to help other Marranos escape the Inquisition. She was an unceasing activist on behalf of her people. She also commissioned the first translation of the Torah into Spanish (the Ferrara Bible), intended for Marranos unable to read Hebrew.

Hannah Werbermacher (1815-1892), known as the "Holy Maid of Ludomir," was a scholar and spiritual healer who challenged the male chassidic establishment of her time. Beloved by the masses, she is still the only woman to have received the title of tzaddik.

Janusz Korczak (1879-1940), director of the Jewish orphanage in Warsaw, was an enlightened and peerless teacher who understood the needs and concerns of children and their right to be taken seriously as human beings. When the Nazis ordered that all the ghetto children be sent to Treblinka, Korczak, who might have escaped, led 200 orphans on their last journey. An account of that grim event states that the children marched with their heads high, singing and holding the flag that their leader had designed for them. Korczak walked ahead of his charges, holding a small child by each hand.

The book is enhanced by more then 100 coloured illuminations from medieval manuscripts in the British Library – all in all, "an esthetic gift of the spirit."

One major criticism of the book is that the biographical material is too skimpy and superficial for more then surface knowledge. Moses, Hillel and Martin Buber deserve more than two pages each. A cavil is that the word prophet is used so broadly as to be confusing.

This book would make an ideal gift for high school students or precocious young people celebrating their bar or bat mitzvah.

Spiritual discussion connects North American Jews

By ERIN SILVER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The spiritual met with the technological recently in a panel discussion featuring Prof. Elie Wiesel and former New York governor Mario Cuomo.

Connected via satellite-imaging to over 15 Jewish community centres across North America, the two men went live to air from the 92nd Street Y in New York City in a discussion titled God: Personal Thoughts.

Scores of people packed a Kolel meeting room in Toronto to hear the renowned figures discuss their thoughts on the subject. It was the first time they were onstage together.

The panel was mediated by Rabbi David Woznica, who asked some personal and soul searching questions.

"Have your thoughts about God changed over the years?" Rabbi Woznica asked, kicking off the discussion.

Elie Wiesel

"The thing that has changed since I was younger is that now it's easier to believe in God," began Cuomo. "When I was young, I put a primacy on being able to prove things. As I grew older and realized how small I was, the process reversed. Now I believe that unless I can prove it's not so, it may be so."

When asked if God is all-powerful, Cuomo gave an equally thoughtful response.

"God is the first force," he said. "He's the reason we exist. He's the purpose of life. There would be a void without God. I think it was God's plan to make an imperfect world and it's up to us, over generations or millennia, to work on repairing it until it's perfect. We're soldiers on a mission to repair the world."

"Is God capable of intervening in human life and does he do it?" asked Rabbi Woznica.

Wiesel answered that it's up to people to make their own decisions, and later, God judges us based on the decisions we made.

"Religion is supposed to elevate the human being," said Wiesel. "Instead, we have seen what it has done. It has brought people down, set them apart. So do we need God? Is he useful?"

The answer was yes.

"We can do what we want in this life, but somewhere there is an accountant taking notes," Wiesel said. "We must explain why we did what we did. We must account to God."

Asked if there have been times in his life when he has felt God's presence, Wiesel answered definitively.

"I have. Sometimes I have felt it more intensely than other times. I can see God's countenance in the face [of my family and friends]. That's why the Jewish texts place great emphasis on the face. Human beings are so sacred because there is God in each of us."

Both Cuomo and Wiesel responded to whether they believe in an afterlife.

"I believe there is an afterlife," said Wiesel. He described how the Jewish texts speak of angels coming down after one dies and asking them six questions before bringing them to heaven.

"Our texts are so imaginative that they become literal creations, but there is an abyss between belief and knowledge."

"I choose to believe in a spiritual afterlife because it's consonant with a basic belief in God," said Cuomo. "It's part of His plan for us to try make the world better, and the reward for trying is a place with civility, where there is no war. You can enjoy it eternally. I will cling to this belief as an inspiration to live a better life."

This was the second in a series of Kallah programs dedicated to adult Jewish learning and to linking Toronto with JCCs across North America.

Integrated arts programs open doors to learning

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sometimes learning can be entertaining. And sometimes that's the best kind of learning.

The Glenn Gould Professional School of the Royal Conservatory of Music's recent presentation of Arlene Perly Rae's adaptation of Igor Stravinsky's Petrouchka is one such example.

Different organizations, including the RCM's Learning through the Arts, Motus O's Dance Theatre and the Glenn Gould Professional School, worked together with Perly Rae to produce a version of the ballet that deals with many issues relevant to children today.

Based on a story about puppets and a wizard who brings them to life, Perly Rae made the plot accessible to children through a simple narrative kids can easily understand.

With the narration of her husband, former Ontario premier Bob Rae, the musical support of the Royal Conservatory Orchestra and dancers from the Motus O Dance Theatre, the story was brought to life for children aged five to... (let's just say I enjoyed it too).

"It's a story which will resonate with kids because it's about bullying and conflicts," Perly Rae said in an interview.

Perly Rae was recently appointed to a committee at Centennial College dedicated to teaching about the Holocaust and preserving its memory. She has worked promoting children's literacy for many years and has served as the chief judge of the Mr. Christie Book Awards.

The intent of the play was to include different art forms so that the kids would be exposed to a more integrated learning experience, Perly Rae said.

The story's messages promote positive ways to deal with issues of body image and self esteem, said Learning Through the Arts director Angela Elster.

Learning through the Arts is an arts-based curriculum created by the Royal Conservatory of Music (RCM) in 1994. The program, which is used here and around the world, uses the arts as an alternative to more traditional classroom techniques by integrating various art forms into the study of math, science, history and language arts.

Motus O Dance director Cindy Croker said that dance, for example, is used to help students understand science problems such as locomotion.

Experiencing the motion themselves can often resolve a problem for the many students who do not learn effectively in a traditional lecture setting, Croker explained.

Elster pointed out that using the arts can bring personal meaning to kids.

For example, unless children have experienced bullying, they can only relate to the issue through their imagination. However, if they experience the situation through creative tools like music, dance or songwriting, then the message becomes more personal, Elster said.

While some of the Jewish Day Schools such as the Toronto Heschel School have their own integrated arts curriculum, the Downtown Jewish Day School (DJDS) participates fully in RCM's program.

Downtown Jewish Day School students use movement as part of the learning process.

"The artist and teachers meet to plan the lesson," said Elysa Cohen, principal of the DJDS. The artist then visits the classroom three times to make sure the curriculum is implemented correctly.

In today's environment, using the arts can be an effective way to help children cope with many of the stresses resulting from world events, Cohen said.

In addition, Perly Rae noted that exposing children to the arts as part of their learning process creates a new outlet for them.

The arts become another alternative to the entertainment choices currently available, Perly Rae said.

Clanton Park's rabbi set to retire after 30 years

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Clanton Park Synagogue will honour Rabbi Yitzchok Kerzner and his wife Rebbitzen Bash Kerzner at a tribute dinner on May 7, at Paradise Banquet Hall.

Well-known for his knowledge of halachah and for his many contributions to this city's Jewish community, Rabbi Kerzner is retiring from his pulpit duties at Clanton Park after heading the Orthodox congregation for 30 years.

Wayne Kurtz, co-chair of the tribute committee with Joseph Edell, said the dinner will express the congregation's gratitude to their rabbi for his three decades of leadership.

"Many people in the community will be joining us at the dinner in recognition of Rabbi Kerzner's outstanding contributions to our community," Kurtz said.

Rabbi Kerzner, who was born in Vienna, received smichah (rabbinic ordination) from Torah V'Odaath. He came to the United States in 1939 with his parents and settled in Brooklyn, N.Y. He studied at the Advanced Research Institute (Beth Medrash Elyon) in Monsey, N.Y., and obtained a degree in political science at Brooklyn College.

Rabbi Yitzchok Kerzner and his wife Rebbitzen Bash Kerzner.

Rabbi Kerzner's first pulpit position after graduation was in New London, Conn., where he founded the Hebrew day school of North East Connecticut. From 1957 to 1972, he served in Wilkes-Barre, Pa. He later became dean of the Israel Ben Zion Academy and was a co-founder of the Mesifta Yeshiva High School in Scranton, Pa.

In 1972, the Kerzners moved to Toronto, where the rabbi helped Clanton Park become one of the most active Orthodox congregations in Canada.

Shortly after his arrival here, he became the assistant to Rabbi Gedalia Felder, who chaired the Rabbinical Vaad Hakashruth before its name changed to the Kashruth Council of Canada (COR). Upon Rabbi Felder's death, Rabbi Kerzner stepped into the top position.

Rabbi Kerzner has also been active with the Vaad Harabonim of Toronto.

Throughout the years, along with his work at Clanton Park, Rabbi Kerzner became involved with various schools and yeshivot.

"There has been a very significant growth, quantitatively and qualitatively in Toronto," he says. "When I came here, there were 90,000 Jews, today I believe there are close to 200,000."

There has been tremendous growth in Jewish education and advanced Torah studies, Rabbi Kerzner says.

"Toronto is one of the fastest growing Jewish communities in North America. On the part of the younger generation, there is tremendous growth of Jewish observance and Jewish education."

Although he is retiring as rabbi of Clanton Park, Rabbi Kerzner plans to continue teaching and working at the Kashruth Council. He is also committed to Israel. His retirement, he says, will give him more time to work on behalf of the Jewish State.

He added he is looking forward to spending more time with his children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren.

Rabbi Kerzner received high praise from the city's community leaders.

"Rabbi Kerzner has managed to build bridges with diverse elements of the community both within and without," said Bob Silberstein, president of Clanton Park Synagogue. "This legacy of unity is one we will strive to continue and emulate into the future.

"From a personal perspective, as president, dealing with Rabbi Kerzner has been a great pleasure. His humility and co-operative spirit have been inspiring."

Rabbi Mordechai Levin, executive director of the Kashruth Council said, "Words alone cannot describe the unceasing personal care and dedication Rav Kerzner has demonstrated as chairman of the Rabbinical Vaad Hakashruth. He has sought and worked to attain the highest standards of kashrut for the city of Toronto.

"Rabbi Kerzner strives to maintain unity of the many segments in the community without compromising the principles of kashrut," Rabbi Levin said. "He has a gift of putting things in proper perspective and has often brought a touch of humour to many tense situations."

Rebbitzen Kerzner, who was born in Brooklyn, taught pre-school at the Yeshiva of Brighton, where she met her husband. She has been very active in Clanton Park Synagogue's Sisterhood as well as other communal and educational organizations, and is one of the founders of the present-day chevrah kadishah.

The Kerzners have been married for 50 years.

REENA

Reena has been enhancing communities for more than twenty-eight years by enabling individuals with a developmental disability to live in comfort and dignity close to family and friends. Consequently, many of our residents are now senior citizens, with increased health, support and social concerns. Almost one third of Reena's current clients are now more than 50 years old, in less than a decade, more than half will be seniors. Seniors with developmental disabilities are in need of a unique set of supports to enable them to remain as independent as possible in their own community.

The cost of Parliament Buildings: $42,000 – but that's just to scale

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Engraver Louis Weiss with his replica of the Canadian Parliament buildings.

TORONTO — Louis Weiss' replica of the Canadian Parliament Buildings "is a remarkable achievement of artistry, craftsmanship and is a wonderful educational tool," says Flavio Belli, the director and curator of the Joseph D. Carrier Art Gallery at the Columbus Centre.

The scale model, which was recently placed in the lobby of the centre, located on Lawrence Avenue west of Dufferin Avenue, was crafted from solid brass and bronze. It weighs 250 kilograms, cost Weiss $42,000, and took him 6,000 hours – working eight hours a day for four years – to complete.

Weiss, 76, was born in Budapest, Hungary, where he studied design, metal relief carving and etching at the School of Fine Arts in Budapest (he graduated in 1944). He worked in a small metal engraving shop where he learned the craft that eventually saved his life.

After Germany invaded Hungary, Weiss was deported to Auschwitz-Birkenau. The Germans were looking for skilled engravers and Weiss was taken to the Arbeitslager to work in a munitions factory.

He recalls that one day before the Russians occupied Auschwitz, 17,000 people were sent on a death march to Dachau. Only 1,800 survived. After Weiss was liberated in 1945 by the Americans, he returned to Hungary to find that his entire family had perished.

Weiss was on one of the first aliyot to Palestine, but was captured near Haifa by a British frigate and transported to Cyprus where he lived for a year behind barbed wire.

In 1947, he got into Palestine and later served as a captain in the Israeli navy for seven years. For a few years after leaving the navy, he owned a machine shop in Haifa. He later moved to Tel Aviv, where he became a sales representative for various European firms selling machine tools to Israel.

While working in sales, he also worked for the Ministry of Defence, setting up the production line of the Israeli tank Merkava.

In 1976, he and his wife Lily followed their children, Taly and Jacob Weiss, to Canada. When he retired, Weiss began doing what he loves most, creating miniatures.

His intricate work combines his technological skills with his artistic talent. Among his works are a model of the Dohany Street Synagogue in Budapest, which is housed in the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Los Angeles, and a series of relief sculptures plated in solid gold titled Expressions of Music.

After completing the mammoth Parliament Buildings project, Weiss offered the replica to the Canadian government, but the negotiations fell through, he says.

Meanwhile, as he was working on a model of St. Peter's Basilica in Rome, which will be presented to the St. Paul's Basilica on Queen St. East in Toronto during the Pope's visit this June, representatives of the Columbus Centre approached Weiss and offered to house the miniature of the Canadian Parliament Buildings in a prominent location in the centre's lobby.

"What impresses me about Mr. Weiss is that as a survivor of man's worst inhumanity to man, he has spent the rest of his life creating beautiful objects and spreading joy and beauty in the world," Belli says.

Weiss is currently working on a model of the Acropolis for the 2004 Olympics in Athens.

Builder Morris Emer remembered for his integrity

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Morris Emer's career as a commercial and residential builder was a means to an end for him, his son Howard recalls. "He wanted to use his time on philanthropic kinds of things."

Moe Emer, as he was known, died Apr. 15 of cancer at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care. He was 75.

Obituary

Chosen as UJA's Man of the Year in 1960, Emer was involved in dozens of charities, serving on the boards of hospitals, organizations supporting universities in Israel, and – among others – the Institute for the Prevention of Child Abuse, which supports children's charities such as the Kids Help Phone. In 1981, he became founding president of the Canadian Children's Foundation.

In 1988, Metropolitan Toronto and the Junior Board of Trade awarded him the Fredrick G. Gardiner Citizen of the Year award.

A Toronto native, Emer left Central Technical School at 16 to take over his father's roofing company after his father suffered a back injury. Within eight years, he had founded his own company, Emer Construction.

In 1963 he became a co-founder of Victoria Wood Development Corp., one of Canada's largest building companies. He later became president of Pinetreee Development.

People trusted Moe, Howard wrote in a eulogy that was read by Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich of Beth Sholom Synagogue. "But if he thought a business opportunity would compromise his values, no matter how big the rewards might have been, he would pass, in favour of his peace of mind."

Emer never expected anything in return, the eulogy continued. "His greatest thanks came in the form of personal letters, from people who benefited directly, from his efforts. He took great pride in knowing he was making a difference."

Outside of business, Emer's interests included movies, music, art, architecture, travel and history, but above all he was a family man, Howard recalled.

"He was a special guy," Rabbi Flanzraich told The CJN. "Throughout his extended illness, the one thing that marked all our conversations was not him. He was always thinking about what new ideas he could have on behalf of the community to make it better."

Emer is survived by Shirley, his wife of almost 54 years; children Candace and Howard; four grandchildren; his brother Leon and sister Rose Roberts.

SOLIDARITY WITH FRENCH JEWS: A vigil was held outside the French Consulate last week in response to the recent rise in anti-Semitism in France, and a petition was circulated requesting more action by the government. Participating in the vigil were (from left) Toronto Symphony Orchestra concertmaster Jacques Israelievitch, his mother Simone, Giller Prize originator Jack Rabinovitch and TSO violinist Mark Skazinetzky.

On Campus

New Zionist group launched at York U

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — York University students Paul Cooper and Hannah and Rebecca Wortzman are the driving forces behind the Young Zionist Partnership (YZP), a new grassroots activist group based at York.

In a recent interview at a mid-town coffee shop, the three organizers expressed concerns one after another, rapid-fire, about attitudes toward Jews and Israel that have been expressed on their campus.

"I'm a political science student, but it seems like I'm studying 'defending myself,'" said Cooper, who is in third year.

Among other incidents, Cooper said he had a run-in with a member of a campus socialist group distributing a poster protesting Israel's presence in the West Bank and Gaza. According to Cooper, the encounter deteriorated when he accused the protester of being a racist and was told, "Get out of here, you Zionist pig."

Even among Jewish students, "a lot... are anti-Israel and feel that if someone's anti-Israel it doesn't mean they're anti-Semitic," said Hannah Wortzman, who like her twin sister Rebecca is in the Jewish Teacher Education program.

Cooper believes Jews who are anti-Israel are not well-informed and not aware of the consequences of abandoning Israel. "I believe that Israel is necessary for the survival of the Jewish people," he said. "I believe that, if not for Israel, there would be another Holocaust."

The group has consulted with JSF: The Centre for Jewish Campus Life at York University and its umbrella organization, Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS), but the fledgling organization is independent.

"We want to be more political," said Rebecca.

"More visible," said Cooper. They would like to have more frequent displays, vigils and rallies, he added.

"Their stance will be a little more proactive" than that of JFS and JCS, confirmed Stuart Lapowich, JCS Israel affairs co-ordinator. "They might be running programs that we wouldn't represent. We're an umbrella organization. Our voice lends itself to all students. We wouldn't have a protest that would make students feel uncomfortable. They're going to take a little more active stance."

The YZP students "definitely have more right-wing views than other students on campus," said Lapowich, adding that JCS would not tell a student what views to hold.

Lapowich said JCS will share resources with the new group.

"I'm happy students are seeing there's a problem and getting involved, taking the initiative. Something we've tried to foster is a sense of empowerment."

Shortly after the Passover suicide bombing in Netanya, Cooper and the Wortzman sisters set up a memorial to about 70 individuals who died as a result of terrorist attacks in Israel in March.

"I made it a point not to give the impression that all Arabs are terrorists, because we don't like when people do that to us," Hannah said. "[I didn't want to] point fingers or stereotype, just let people know we we're struggling."

Her group's concerns, which are shared by JCS staff members, include the portrayal of Israel in the Atkinsonian, a campus newspaper, and the activities of the anti-racism working group of CUPE 3903, a campus union whose members include teaching assistants who may teach Jewish students and mark their work.

One of the working group's rallies in a high-traffic open area prompted the Wortzman sisters to e-mail Deborah Hobson, York's vice-president of enrolment and student services, accusing speaker Samer Elatrash, a pro-Palestinian activist from Montreal, of inciting hatred and disseminating "terrorist literature" from the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine.

Hobson's response to Hannah included the suggestion that she "consider not attending events like this. You find them upsetting, and your presence contributes to providing an audience for views that you would prefer not to have expressed."

JSF staff have also contacted York's administration about Elatrash's activities on campus, but as of last week had not received a response, said JSF director Shayna Allen.

AID TO SOLDIERS: Hamilton Hebrew Academy students prepared packages of supplies to be shipped to Israeli soldiers serving in the current conflict. Included in the packages are handwritten notes expressing the students' support and concern for the soldiers' well-being. The project was initiated for this year's Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration.

Coast to Coast

A more lucid piece from The Economist

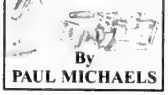
According to Reports



By PAUL MICHAELS

From time to time, this column has drawn attention to editorial comments in the British weekly The Economist because it is so influential in shaping Canadian media opinion. Never shy of criticizing Israel, often harshly and sometimes unfairly, The Economist has nonetheless occasionally expressed understanding of Israel's predicament and has disapproved of Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's leadership, especially since he walked away from Camp David in the summer of 2000.

The Economist's lead editorial of April 20 is one of these more lucid pieces. It discusses the divide between Europe and the United States over U.S. Mideast policy. U.S. President George W. Bush's commitment to "moral clarity" in the fight against terrorism, with few exceptions, is not shared by other European states when it comes to Israel's own battle against terrorists.

While The Economist argues that Bush may "at some point" have to apply pressure on Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to accept "an independent Palestine and Israel back more or less to its 1967 borders," it continues: "[T]he Europeans should not expect Mr. Bush to pressure Israel in circumstances that seemed to appease terrorism. In other words, Mr. Arafat must accept – in good faith, this time – the principle underpinning the Oslo accords, which is that negotiating peace is not compatible with a terrorist war.

"If they were serious about helping the Palestinians to statehood, Europeans would explain this to the Palestinians morning and night, instead of hailing the intifadah, as many do, as 'resistance.' The intifadah it was that helped Mr. Sharon to power, destroyed Israel's peace camp and turned Americans off the Palestinian cause. After Sept. 11, Americans feel that they too are at risk, and at war. Europeans do not."

The Economist editorial begs the question on a number of issues. For instance, it assumes against all evidence that Arafat can be reformed so as to negotiate in "good faith," and that, at this point, something can still be salvaged from the Oslo accords. But its effort to understand why the United States refuses to sell out Israel (as Europe most likely would) is encouraging.

Also heartening is The Economist's elaboration on what goads the Americans: "Above all, [they] cannot understand why some Europeans dignify terrorism as legitimate 'resistance' to an occupation which, but for the Palestinians' intransigence, Israel's previous government would have ended anyway."

Dennis Ross, head of the U.S. Mideast policy team under former U.S. president Bill Clinton, underscored this point when he described precisely what Arafat rejected at Camp David and Taba and why. In an interview with Brit Hume on Fox News (April 21), Ross insisted that Arafat could have had a contiguous state on almost all the West Bank and in all of the Gaza Strip. He failed to achieve this because he would not sign an "end of conflict" agreement with Israel, refusing to recognize Jewish claims to Jerusalem, and insisting that Israel accept a Palestinian "right of return."

Contrary to The Economist, Ross believes that Arafat is incapable of negotiating in good faith and concluding any meaningful deal with Israel.

B.C. philanthropist gave away more than $50M

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

Obituary

VANCOUVER — Morris Wosk, who died April 9 of heart failure in Las Vegas at 84, personified what it is to be a mensch.

An eminent and well-respected figure in Vancouver and the powerhouse behind numerous organizations, institutions and communal causes, Wosk was dedicated to the advancement of Jewish, Zionist and charitable causes in Canada, Israel and the United States.

Wosk's long and enduring legacy of philanthropy in Vancouver went back to his father's teachings. "My father told me, 'If you make 10 cents, put one cent away, give one cent to charity and spend the rest, if you have to,'" Wosk once said.

Wosk estimated that he gave away more than $50 million in his lifetime. His contributions included the construction of the Beit Wosk Community Centre in Ashkelon, and a $3.5 million contribution toward the Morris J. Wosk Centre for Dialogue at Vancouver's Simon Fraser University.

Wosk's motto was "there's nothing like helping other people," and his charitable donations primarily benefited health and education.

His humble beginnings make his story all the more exceptional: he arrived in Canada from Odessa, Ukraine (then part of the Soviet Union) in 1928 as a poor immigrant with little to call his own and no grasp of English.

By age 13, he began street peddling, and at 15 he quit school, eventually opening a store with his father and brother that sold second-hand merchandise in Vancouver. Persistence and hard work paid off: the business grew, and a few years later, Wosk and his brother were selling new furniture and appliances. Wosk's department stores were among the city's top retailers from the 1940s to the 1960s. In the 1960s, Wosk turned his focus to real estate, building a series of apartments and hotels.

At the time of his death, Wosk was head of M.J. Investments Ltd. and Liberty Investments. Even in his golden years, he spent many hours at his desk in his office overlooking the ocean.

In his eight decades, Wosk changed the face of Vancouver, broke bread with some of the world's most powerful men and women and received countless accolades for his generosity. But he reserved his greatest pride for his four children, and his six grandchildren. Wosk's wife, Dena, died in 2000.

In 1980, Wosk was the third Canadian ever to be honoured with the Prime Minister's Medal of the State of Israel, and in 1985 he received the Human Relations Award from the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews.

Wosk maintained residences in Israel and Vancouver, but was fiercely loyal to the latter, once declaring stoically: "Vancouver's my city and the sweetness of success is very great when I go for a drive on Sunday and see what I've accomplished. It gives me a great deal of pride."

Israel is facing

That's why UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign

Here are answers to the most important questions you've been asking about this campaign:

Q: What is the emergency?

A: Nearly two years of relentless terror have stretched Israel's human services to the breaking point. More than 125 Israelis were murdered in March 2002 alone. The Government of Israel is shifting billions of dollars to security and defense. Tourism is virtually non-existent. The economy is deteriorating rapidly.

Q: How much money is required?

A: We are encouraging all donors to give the largest increase they possibly can. All of the increase will go directly to help the people of Israel. Our goal is to raise at least an additional $13 million through Israel Emergency Campaign 2003 as part of a North America-wide $300 million U.S. fundraising effort.

2003 is now underway, four months ahead of schedule.

Q: Where will the money be going?

A: The money will go to:

- Assist victims of terror and their families
- Increase security in day care centres, kindergartens and other facilities for children
- Enhance medical and psychological support plus other human services for vulnerable populations most affected by the crisis.

Join millions of Jews across North America who are responding passionately to an unprecedented Israel Emergency fundraising drive.

Israel needs our help.

Rabbi Melchior talks with The CJN

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Prior to his address as keynote speaker at the April 21 solidarity rally for Israel on Parliament Hill, Israel's Deputy Foreign Minister Rabbi Michael Melchior spoke briefly to The CJN about Israel's relationship with Canada, the recent wave of Jewish support for Israel in North America, the Israel Defence Forces' actions in Jenin and terrorism.

When asked about his relationship with Canadian Foreign Minister Bill Graham, Rabbi Melchior said, "I think we had a very good chemistry and I was very impressed with his commitment as a result of this meeting to stand up for what is fair in Geneva [at the recently concluded annual meeting of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights], and it is not so easy because Geneva has in some ways become a farce on the issue of human rights.

"[Graham] took upon himself some commitments on behalf of Canada and our ambassador reports that he has lived up to these commitments and I feel that his concern is genuine, both for the safety of Israel and for peace. That doesn't mean that we will always agree on every single detail."

Asked whether news of the Ottawa rally and other recent rallies in North America have reached Israel and what impact they might have on Israelis, Rabbi Melchior said that the support is very much appreciated.

"It is very important for the people of Israel that Jews and friends of Israel around the world are rallying... It shows that there is a feeling that when Israel is hurting and bleeding, that people are standing up and rallying for Israel. [That is] is very important for the people of Israel."

Rabbi Melchior saw the goals of the Ottawa rally as twofold:

"The goals are both to give a clear message to Israel, but also to the Canadian public that there are many friends behind Israel in Canada. People will not accept the terror against Israel or any kind of double standard when it comes to terror."

On the conflicting media reports of what happened in Jenin, Rabbi Melchior said he recognized it was a tragedy, but placed the responsibility squarely on the shoulders of the Palestinian terrorists.

"We must put things in context. This is a terror that hides behind civilians. The refugee camps became factories of terror. I think that things have to be said; that those who made them the factory of terror bear the main guilt. Those who refused all agreements and compromises bear the responsibility."

Atlantic Jews celebrate Israel's 54th birthday

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — The city's community celebrated Yom Ha'atzmaut recently with an event that began with a subdued mood but ended on an upbeat note.

The event at Beth Israel Synagogue attracted more than 120 people to an evening of Israeli food, speeches by local Atlantic Jewish Council officials, a plaque presentation to the Atlantic Jewish Council (AJC) from the City of Halifax and a phone call from two Haligonians who were on a solidarity mission to Israel.

The crowd listened as AJC board member Cathy Zilbert and past president Victor Goldberg spoke from Israel about being in the Jewish state at this time.

"Israelis are a strong and courageous people," said Zilbert. "Our tour guide left us to go home to celebrate his first Yom Hazikaron [Remembrance Day] with his family since he lost his son [in the current conflict] two months ago. But he was back the next day to continue working with us. His strength to carry on was inspirational. And he stressed how good a place this is to live."

Zilbert said they spoke with teens in Haifa who have a different kind of life than Canadian teens "but they told us they're not going to stop their lives. Their parents, they said, tell them not to use public buses or visit malls or clubs but they are not letting the situation take over their lives."

Goldberg said the people have told the mission members they cannot understand why there is not more emotional support from Jews abroad. "They tell us they are alone here," he said. "But we are proud and honoured to be here."

Mark Rosen, vice-president of AJC, speaking in Halifax, announced that the AJC would be joining a North America-wide $300 million emergency campaign for Israel, saying, "The [Israeli] economy is in tatters, the tourism industry is non-existent and construction has almost ceased. Our help is needed."

The mood brightened when four members of the eight-piece Bais Groove band – vocalists Stacey Wintre and Rachel Mitchell, keyboard player and arranger Robbie Grunwald and guitarist and composer Mark Weinstock (drummer Ben Gaum, bassist Eldan Cohen, percussionist Dave Bloom and lead guitar Jeremy Otto did not attend) – took the stage.

The twenty-something Toronto musicians, who had played Moncton, N.B., the evening before, performed a variety of contemporary Hebrew and Yiddish songs, stringing together several upbeat melodies and concluding with Salaam-Shalom, a rousing peace song in Arabic and Hebrew.

Hamilton principal retires after 29 years at HHA

By MOURA WOLPERT
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — Rabbi William Zev Eisenstein, much-loved principal of the Hamilton Hebrew Academy (HHA) for the past 29 years, has retired.

A gala tribute in his honour will be held at 2 p.m. on May 26, at Adas Israel Synagogue, 125 Cline Ave. S. In order to accommodate the many HHA alumni now living in Toronto and elsewhere who wish to attend, a reception rather than a formal dinner has been planned, said tribute committee co-chairs Jacki and Dr. Larry Levin.

Rabbi Eisenstein said he knew early in life that he wanted to be a teacher, but he also knew what kind of teacher he did not want to be like: his Grade 1 teacher in New York, "a spinster, as all teachers were in those days," who called him up to the front of the class one day and told him to read aloud, he said.

"I wasn't so good in reading," he recalled, adding that the teacher not only called him "a dummy" but sat him on a stool in the corner and put a dunce cap on his head – "another thing teachers did in those days."

Rabbi Eisenstein also remembered the principal of a large high school who ruled from his office, who was "very power conscious."

Growing up on the Lower East Side of Manhattan in an observant family that was "very rich in love but not rich financially," Rabbi Eisenstein became, he confessed, a street kid, a member of an Italian gang until the age of 15. He was good in sports and though his teachers did not like him, his peers did. But when he discovered B'nai Akiva, "that turned me around," he said.

Rabbi Eisenstein

Before coming to Hamilton, he was principal of Torah Academy High School for Girls in St. Louis and Bikur Cholim Hebrew School in Seattle, Wash., where he met and married his wife, Esther.

Rather than be principal of a large high school, Rabbi Eisenstein wanted to lead a small school "where I could have some influence," he said. When he was offered the position with the HHA, he accepted with enthusiasm. His job was primarily "to build up the teachers," he said, adding that he frequently wrote thank you notes to them.

He and Rabbi Morton Green, spiritual leader of Adas Israel Congregation and founder and dean of the HHA, have the same philosophy, Rabbi Eisenstein said, and he is grateful to his colleague "for allowing me to do whatever I wanted." Rabbi Eisenstein also credited Grade 8 teacher and assistant principal Rivka Shafifir for his success.

He has also served as spiritual leader for Brantford's Beth David Synagogue and for many of the smaller surrounding communities when needed.

Much as he loved his work as principal, he said, he felt it was time to leave the position to a younger person. "Times have changed," he said. "Today's challenges are different – computers, technology…"

Meanwhile, he said, Hamilton has become home, and although their children are scattered – they have a son and daughter in New York and another son and daughter in Israel – the Eisensteins will remain here. Rabbi Eisenstein still teaches grades 1 and 2 and intends to remain actively involved in the community.

"The rocking chair is not for me," he said.

Spate of anti-Semitic incidents related to Mideast worries Montreal

"After the soccer game, they jumped over the park fence and attacked students from the Centre Hillel who were pushed and kicked. One of the soccer players then pulled out a knife and uttered death threats. The assaulters then escaped."

A complaint was made to police, who have opened a file on the matter, said BBC research director Raphael Lallouz.

Scheinberg urged leaders of Montreal's Arab community and all faith communities to "remind your sisters and brothers that there is no room in Canada for racism and anti-Semitism, even in the guise of a political cause."

In another incident, BBC, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and the Canada-Israel Committee joined to denounce a radio broadcaster for what they consider intolerant comments.

A public statement issued by representatives of the three organizations "condemned in the strongest possible terms" remarks made by CKAC show host Benoît Dutrizac about the pro-Israel rally.

According to a translation of the transcript provided in the statement, Dutrizac said: "Would you leave us the hell alone. If you want to hold a demonstration, go to the Old Port, go somewhere where you won't give us a pain in the ass…

"There were Jews with their Israeli flags. Put your flags away… Would you give us a bloody break with your demonstrations, and if that's not good enough, go demonstrate in Jerusalem; if you want to do something useful, go there."

The Jewish groups called the remarks "vulgar and scandalous." This is the second complaint they have had about this station in the past few weeks. On April 11, host Pierre Mailloux commented that he was looking for "a good historian who could draw a parallel between [Israel Prime Minister] Ariel Sharon and [Adolf] Hitler and the rise of the Nazi army… the Israeli army's carnage… and their non-stop propaganda."

CJC communication officer Eta Yudin said neither the announcers nor the station has responded to the community's concern.

Three North Winnipeg synagogues join forces

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Faced with rapidly declining memberships, north Winnipeg's three Conservative synagogues – the Rosh Pina, Beth Israel and Bnay Abraham – voted April 15, to merge and form a new entity called Etz Chayim.

The vote was a culmination of several months of intense negotiations after three or four years of exploratory talks.

The Rosh Pina congregation, whose building will house Etz Chayim, was Winnipeg's second oldest and second largest synagogue (after Shaarey Zedek Synagogue in south Winnipeg). In recent years, however, with the declining Jewish population here (it now stands at 14,000) and with the majority of the community having moved to the south end, Rosh Pina's membership dropped from about 1,000 to less than 500 – with at least half the membership living in south Winnipeg.

For several years, Rosh Pina's board had been looking for ways to increase membership. There had been an attempt to sell the building and relocate south, as well as past merger talks with Shaarey Zedek and Beth Israel.

The 26-year-old Beth Israel Synagogue had been riding high under the leadership of Rabbi Alan Green. Membership during his seven-year tenure grew from under 200 to a peak of 270. But after Green left two years ago to fill a vacancy at the larger Shaarey Zedek, Beth Israel was unable to replace him and membership began to fall. (The shul now has just over 200 members.)

Last spring, Rosh Pina again approached Beth Israel about a merger.

Once talks got going, the 45-year-old Bnay Abraham congregation asked to join. Bnay Abraham, whose membership is largely made up of Holocaust survivors and their families, has mixed seating, but unlike the other two congregations, it is not egalitarian. Its membership had fallen to about 100 and the future did not look promising.

But the merger discussions really began to pick up steam after Jack London was brought in as a mediator. London, a former dean of the faculty of law at the University of Manitoba, put in countless hours bringing the shuls together and smoothing over differences.

Etz Chayim is expected to start out with about 670 members. Under the terms of the agreement, the three constituent synagogues will continue to hold independent Shabbat services until the end of August and then come together for the High Holy Days. (Beth Israel and Rosh Pina have been holding joint daily minyanim since the beginning of February.) An 18-person board has been appointed with equal representation from each of the shuls. Each shul's cemetery will continue to operate independently.

There are short- and long-term plans to renovate the current Rosh Pina building to accommodate the new Etz Chayim congregation.

Plans call for the Bnay Abraham building to be sold while the smaller Beth Israel building will be retained for the time being. Two Jewish communal organizations – the Aleph Bet Day Care and the Rady Jewish Community Centre – have already inquired about renting the Beth Israel building.

Record CJA haul won't mean more cash for agencies

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — It may have been a record-setting year for the Combined Jewish Appeal 2001-2002 campaign here, but local beneficiary agencies should not expect more money, says Winnipeg Jewish Federation/CJA secretary-treasurer Brent Trepel.

While the community raised $3,785,000 in the campaign, $245,000 more than the year before, Trepel says there will be no additional local allocations. Beneficiary agencies in the city will receive $1,612,000 in total, the same as last year.

Trepel said the reasons are twofold:

Firstly, donors allocated more money to the United Israel Appeal in 2001-2002 than in recent years. (Winnipeg is the only Jewish community campaign in North America that still allows donors to designate how much of their donation goes to local needs and how much goes to Israel or other overseas causes.)

As well, three years ago, the CJA introduced designated giving for major donors, which lets those donors choose what specific agency or agencies will receive any increases in their gifts, rather than leaving the decision to Federation/CJA.

Trepel said designated giving for major donors is a key reason why the annual campaign has reached new heights in the last few years.

But he said most of the $245,000 campaign increase in 2001-2002 came from two individuals, and most of the increase in designated donations from major donors went to support Israel rather than local needs.

Trepel added that the remainder of the $245,000 campaign increase is needed to make up for a reduction in Federation/CJA investment income due to low interest rates and to cover annual allocations to Federation/CJA reserves.

The Federation/CJA campaign goal for 2002-2003 is $4 million.

After the rallies what should we do?

Even amid our justifiable collective pride, we must wonder why it took so long to rouse this community. Why was the Palestinians' decision back in September 2000 to turn from negotiations to terror not enough? Why wasn't Hezbollah's illegal kidnapping of three young soldiers on the border with Lebanon enough? Why wasn't the lynching of two reservists in the fall of 2000 or the bludgeoning to death of two 13-year-olds that spring enough? Why weren't the Dolphinarium disco killings or the Sbarro Pizzeria murders enough? Why wasn't Durban enough? Or the Sept. 11 slaughter or the Daniel Pearl homicide or the daily sniping at commuters enough? Why did it take over 12,000 terrorist incidents in 19 months culminating in the heinous Netanya Seder Massacre for most Jews to mobilize?

Moreover, the rallies themselves, for all their energy, also illustrated the limits of Jewish power. The Canadian rallies testified to the community's extraordinary internal strength – perhaps best exemplified by the Montreal rally that may have mobilized as much as a quarter of the entire community. That kind of participation reflects a cohesive community with vibrant institutions and a committed rank and file, especially because the rally itself was a grassroots initiative that the leadership embraced and helped succeed. But it was hard not to watch the Canadian rallies without cringing at the Jewish community's political impotence. The mayor of Montreal was AWOL as was the Premier of Quebec and high level representatives of the Chrétien government. Even the Ottawa rally lacked the proper representation from the Chrétien government considering how loyal and financially generous Jews have been to the Liberals.

The Washington rally offered a mirror image. The podium brimmed with American political superstars, congressional leaders and senators, Republicans and Democrats, even a top administration official, as well as the poster child for America's fight against terror, former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani. American Jewish political power – and American Jewish popularity among their fellow Americans – was on display. Less clear, however, was the true internal strength of the community. Yes, thousands skipped work on a Monday afternoon to demonstrate for Israel, but millions stayed home, and still cannot be bothered to inconvenience themselves for the embattled Jewish state, even for one day.

Jews cannot afford to be complacent. Both communities, in the long term, will need to assess their own particular strengths and weaknesses, and maybe even try to learn from one another. However, the immediate focus must be on building momentum from these dramatic moments into sustained and effective community action.

These rallies – and the violence and vitriol Israel has endured – should serve as wake-up calls. We can no longer proceed with business as usual. We need to inconvenience ourselves, to put some projects on hold, to divert precious time and money to this fight for Israel's survival. Jews individually and collectively need to incorporate supporting Israel into our daily lives. Bar mitzvahs and weddings must carve out time to mourn and to respond. Shock of all shocks, even synagogue building projects must be reconsidered. We must learn more. We must act decisively. And we must give generously.

Learning: We must master the facts and clarify our opinions. We must take the time to read books and to follow the story on the Internet and in the press. We need to understand our history so that we can explain that Israel ended up with the territories in 1967 because Israel's neighbours were trying to obliterate Israel. We need to understand and explain that all this talk about "ending the occupation" is belied by Israel's record of territorial generosity, first with Egypt in 1979, and then with the Palestinians in Oslo.

Never before in history has a country that won disputed territory after being attacked by its neighbours voluntarily relinquished the territory for peace – until Israel did it twice. And we need to understand and explain that if Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat had responded to former prime minister Ehud Barak's Camp David 2000 proposals with counter-proposals and not with violence, Palestinians might already have a state of their own rather than a state of war.

Moreover, we need to counter lies with facts. As the Jenin libel metastasizes, we need to note that the United States waited only three weeks before responding to terror with an invasion while Israel waited a year and a half; that the United States dropped bombs on terrorist infested areas while Israel went house to house; that Jenin was a battlefield, not a killing field; and that even amidst the horror, despite the fact that dozens of their comrades died, many Israeli soldiers fighting in the West Bank tried to be as humane as possible. In Tulkarm, some reservists raised 1,500 shekels to help a Palestinian family repair a damaged wall; in Bethlehem another group raised 2000 shekels to compensate a family whose house they used. Obviously, other moments were more brutal, but such acts of kindness should also be considered.

Acting: We need to focus our actions on three critical players in this conflict whom we can influence: the media, our politicians and our Israeli brothers and sisters. When reporters mislead, distort, sermonize or falsely balance victims and victimizers; anti-terror tactics with suicide bombings; 20,000 demonstrators as opposed to 150 counter-demonstrators; we should bombard them with polite and detailed calls, emails and letters.

At the same time, we need to pressure the Canadian government to support Israel – applauding the government when it votes against biased anti-Israel resolutions at a supposed human rights conference in Geneva, and chastising the government when it lazily compares Israel's response to a bombing with the act of terror itself. And even as we lend political support, we must not forget how important our moral support is for the people of Israel right now. We must visit. We must write. We must shop there long distance (www.israelexport.org or www.shopinisrael.com). We must send care packages to soldiers (www.apackagefromhome.org). We must adopt the families of victims. The Web site www.walk4israel.com lists dozens of ways we can help the thousands of Israelis whose lives have been marred by terrorism. Every family, every shul, every school and every organization should identify one victim or group of victims – and bomb them with our love, our support, our own expertise if useful, and our cash if necessary.

Giving: The learning and the acting must be reinforced by giving. The United Jewish Communities is spearheading an emergency fund-raising campaign, with 100 percent going to Israel. Magen David Adom, the Israeli Red Cross, is desperate for more medical supplies, more personnel and more ambulances (www.interlog.com/~cmda/support.html). Hadassah hospital has won worldwide acclaim for treating all victims equally, both Arabs and Jews (www.canadian-hadassah-wizo.org/site). Virtual shopping networks have developed encouraging North Americans to purchase goods from Israeli Web sites. As Europeans threaten to boycott Israeli products, we need to make extra efforts to patronize Israeli businesses, no matter what the cost. Our collective financial weight – through charity, investments and shopping – must do what it can for Israel's economy.

The time is short, the work is great. The needs are pressing and mounting. With any luck, this crisis will be temporary, not the permanent condition of the 21st century. As a result, when our children and grandchildren ask us, "Where were you in 2002?" we will be able to say: "I recognized the lethal and ugly challenge to the state of Israel and the Jewish people. I stood up. I learned, I acted, I gave till it hurt – and it felt great."

Israel: yes to U.S. Ramallah plan, no to UN Jewish mission

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — In two key decisions this week, Israel made it clear that when it comes to international intervention, there are those it can trust and those it cannot.

During a marathon cabinet session Sunday, Israel put the United Nations in the second category, voting against allowing a UN fact-finding panel to visit the Jenin refugee camp.

Earlier in the cabinet meeting, the government gave an altogether different verdict regarding U.S. and British soldiers when it approved an American plan for ending Israel's siege of Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's Ramallah headquarters.

After the cabinet voted Sunday to bar temporarily the fact-finding panel, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres spoke to the head of the UN team and "informed him that the arrival of the committee will be delayed until further clarifications about current issues," according to a spokesman for Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

Spokesperson Arnon Perlman also said Sharon has been invited to Washington next week for talks with U.S. President George W. Bush.

Following the cabinet decision, the UN panel members, who were due to arrive in Israel on Sunday from Geneva, cancelled their flights.

The panel was going to investigate Palestinian claims of an Israeli massacre at the camp when Israeli forces scoured the camp for terrorists earlier this month.

Prior to the cabinet meeting, Peres said the panel's mission amounted to a search for a "blood libel" against Israel.

Concerned about a possible anti-Israel bias in the panel, Israel sent a team to New York late last week in an effort to change the committee's composition and mandate.

Some progress was made in those efforts. According to reports, UN officials had agreed to Israel's request that military personnel who testify before the panel will be anonymous and will be immune from legal proceedings against them. At the same time, UN officials retained the right to determine the witnesses it calls.

The panel originally was slated to arrive Saturday, but UN Secretary- General Kofi Annan postponed its arrival until Sunday following an Israeli request earlier in the weekend.

In another development, two U.S. senators prepared a letter to Annan, suggesting parameters for the fact-finding mission.

Senator Charles Schumer, a Democrat from New York, and Senator Gordon Smith, a Republican from Oregon, urged Annan to investigate the actions of Palestinians in the Jenin refugee camp as well as Israelis, and for the team to look at facts, but not present conclusions or recommendations for a course of action.

"There must be a form of objectivity displayed by the United Nations," the letter said. "If actions taken by Israel are to be investigated, so too should those by the Palestinian Authority and the forces under its control and authority in Jenin."

The other major decision reached Sunday by Israel's cabinet soon elicited a positive response from the United States.

After the cabinet agreed to an American plan for ending the siege at Arafat's headquarters, the White House issued a statement saying, "The president views the vote of the Israeli Cabinet as helpful and constructive.

"The next move is up to Yasser Arafat," the statement added.

Hours after the cabinet voted its approval, Arafat also accepted the U.S. plan, according to a Palestinian spokesman.

Israel's communications minister, Reuven Rivlin, hinted at a link between Israel's acceptance of the Ramallah proposal and the decision about the UN panel. Amid uncertainty and wariness over how the UN mission will proceed, Israel will need firm U.S. backing, Rivlin said Sunday.

Under the U.S. plan, American and British troops would guard Palestinians wanted by Israel for last October's murder of Tourism Minister Rehavam Ze'evi.

Last week, a Palestinian tribunal handed down sentences ranging from one to 18 years to four men for Ze'evi's murder. But Israel called the move a sham and demanded their handover.

The troops would also guard a Palestinian official who is alleged to have overseen an attempt to smuggle arms aboard the Karine-A, a ship intercepted by Israel in January.

After the Palestinians are turned over to U.S. and British officials, Israel would withdraw from Ramallah and allow Arafat to travel between the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

IDF foils series of attacks

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli military sources said Sunday the Israel Defence Forces' (IDF) operations in Qalqilyah on Saturday prevented possibly one of the largest terror attacks seen in Israel.

The sources said the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP) planned to detonate huge explosive devices underneath at least one skyscraper in Israel's centre.

The Shin Bet security service received information regarding a planned attack by the PFLP, and Israeli forces subsequently entered Qalqilyah, where they operated for over 24 hours.

During the operation, two wanted terrorists were arrested.

IDF sources also reported that they had discovered a booby-trapped car carrying a large explosive load, which they suspected was intended to be used for a bombing in Tel Aviv.

The IDF operation in the city uncovered three bomb-making factories, from which soldiers confiscated explosive belts, pipe bombs and hand grenades. IDF sappers detonated all of the devices.

Synagogue Executive Director Congregation Etz Chayim
Winnipeg, Manitoba

Congregation Etz Chayim is a conservative, egalitarian synagogue very recently established by the amalgamation of three Winnipeg Synagogues – Beth Israel, Bnay Abraham and Rosh Pina. The synagogue will have a membership of 700 families and will also have responsibility for the operation of three cemeteries, three seniors' apartment buildings, banquet facilities and an active fund raising program.

We are seeking the services of an experienced, highly motivated and mature Executive Director who will have overall administrative responsibility for the operation of the Synagogue and its associated facilities, and will assure that the overall policies of the Board of Directors are carried out in an effective, efficient and business-like manner. The position offers an innovative challenge for a highly motivate administrator with proven leadership, communication and strong inter-personal skills.

THE EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR WILL BE RESPONSIBLE FOR:
- The fiscal and administrative management of the Synagogue and its associated facilities including the corporate office, cemeteries, buildings, fund raising activities and catering.
- Supervision of all personnel.
- Provision of administrative support to the Board of Directors, its Executive Committee and Board Committees and the Synagogue's spiritual leader.
- The development of a user-friendly corporate office, which will foster a warm, friendly and efficient environment for congregants and staff.

QUALIFICATIONS:
- Excellent inter-personal, management, conflict resolution and organizational skills.
- Creative self-motivating problem solver with ability to prioritize assignments.
- Highly organized with an ability to lead by example.
- Strong financial skills and experience.
- Understanding of Jewish ritual, religious observances and traditions.
- Excellent verbal and writing skills.
- Appropriate computer skills including word-processing, spreadsheets, accounting software, internet and e-mail.
- Knowledge of Hebrew and Yiddish would be an asset.
- A combination of suitable education and experience, including a minimum of five years progressive managerial experience in the administration of a synagogue or Jewish organization.

This position is available immediately on a full-time or contractual basis.

Please reply by May 13, 2002, in writing or by e-mail, sending your resumé including three references and your salary expectations to:

Canadian volunteers help to rebuild terror site

By EDGAR ASHER
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — A group of seven Canadian volunteers arrived in Israel at the end of last week in order to show their solidarity.

Starting April 23, the group began helping to reconstruct the Moment Café in Jerusalem, where 11 people died on March 9 in a suicide bombing attack. The group had also been doing guard duty in schools in the Negev city of Beersheva.

"This is a group of volunteers who decided that they wanted to come over and roll up their sleeves and work to help rebuild damaged buildings, alongside Israelis, and to do something positive in response to terror," said Marc Gold, a member of the executive of Federation CJA of Montreal and director of the Israel overseas department of the federation. "They approached the federation and we helped organize this trip.

"We in Montreal have strong identification with Israel, for example we organized a huge solidarity rally last week for Yom Ha'atzmaut with 25,000 people marching downtown," Gold said.

"We have just launched an Israel emergency campaign and we have already raised $7.5 million, and that's only the beginning. In addition to raising money and marching in solidarity we also want to come and be here physically and do the things that need to be done, especially with so many reservists being called up."

Upon their return to Canada, the group will work with Gold to publicize this mission in the hope that it will inspire others in the community to come and volunteer in the same way.

"These volunteers, and those that will follow, are doing much more than merely expressing solidarity will Israel," said Howard Weisband, Director General of the United Israel Appeal Federation Canada.

"They are the Jewish answer to the so-called 'human shields' who showed up from Europe to spin artificial headlines. These people are rolling up their sleeves and working to counter the horrible effects of the terror attacks."

Some of the Canadian group painted the new roof structure of the café, which was totally destroyed in last month's blast, while others sanded stone work ingrained with debris and burn marks from the explosion.

Ruth Najman, who is an English, dance and aerobics teacher, was busy putting an undercoat of paint on a new metal support column.

"I'm here because of my love for the country. I want to help out when so many people have anti-Israel feelings. This helps me to express my solidarity for the country and raise people's morale."

Najman, who is also the co-ordinator of the March of the Living in Montreal, said, "This year, Montreal was one of the only communities that was ready to come to Israel from Poland, since Israel was an integral part according to our philosophy.

"We were coming here from Poland until the last minute and it was only a decision in Chol Hamoed Pesach, following the terrible Netanya seder night suicide bomb [just a week before this year's March] that we had to change our mind. We are now planning to bring a group over here in December."

European Jews seek strategy as anti-Semitic attacks mount

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUDAPEST — European Jewish leaders are searching for a common strategy to confront a mounting wave of anti-Semitism apparently linked to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Leaders from more than a score of countries met last week for two days in Brussels about how to confront the anti-Semitic outbursts.

The meeting brought together leaders of the European Jewish Congress, the European Council of Jewish Communities, the World Jewish Congress (WJC) and representatives of individual Jewish communities from across the continent.

One of its aims was to create a unified political voice for European Jewry and set up a standing policy committee to co-ordinate a response to the new spate of anti-Semitic violence.

At the end of the meeting, the WJC announced it would establish an international task force to track the activities of the United Nations (UN), which often is perceived as hostile to Israel. The need for such a body became clear after last summer's UN anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa, turned into one of the most vicious outpourings of anti-Israel and anti-Semitic sentiment at an international forum since World War II.

The WJC also plans to establish a Jewish lobby in Europe, similar to Jewish lobbies in the United States, to monitor anti-Semitism and make Jewish concerns known to European governments.

Delegates said they also planned to organize within the next few weeks a mass rally of European Jews in either Brussels – the headquarters of the European Union – or Strasbourg, France, the site of the European Parliament, to show that European governments must shake off their indifference nor dismiss anti-Semitism in Europe as simply a fallout from the Mideast conflict.

European Union "governments cannot just shrug their shoulders and say it's all part of the Middle East problem," Avi Beker, secretary-general of the World Jewish Congress, told Reuters.

There has been a spate of anti-Semitic incidents in Europe – ranging from verbal taunts and graffiti to attacks on synagogues and other Jewish buildings – since the Palestinian intifadah began in September 2000. Several Jews have been roughed up on the street.

The number of incidents has increased sharply since Israel launched its military incursions into the West Bank in late March. Figures provided by the European Jewish Congress counted some 300 anti-Jewish attacks in the last three weeks.

In Belgium alone, a synagogue in the town of Charleroi was sprayed with bullets last week in an apparent drive-by shooting. Two other Belgian synagogues were recently firebombed, and suspected arsonists also targeted a Brussels building that housed a Jewish bookshop.

Police and other observers believe most of the incidents have been the acts of individual hooligans or angry, alienated youths, rather than part of an orchestrated campaign.

Most of the incidents have occurred in Western Europe, and particularly in France, but there have been several incidents in former Communist countries, including an attack earlier this month on a synagogue in Kiev, Ukraine.

Even at this conference, for example, two Jewish leaders were attacked when they arrived in Brussels.

Rabbi Avraham Berkowitz, executive director of the Federation of Jewish Communities in the former Soviet Union, was attacked as he stepped off the train that brought him to the Brussels meeting. He said an Arab-looking man punched him in the stomach, stole his hat and called him a terrorist.

Moscow Chief Rabbi Pinchas Goldschmidt also said he was attacked by four Arabs who shouted, "Death to the Jews!"

"The Jewish communities are very concerned about the situation," said Gabriel Taus, executive director of the European Council of Jewish Communities. "If some people doubted the seriousness of it before, they don't doubt it now. There has been a drastic rise in incidents. Some people are openly wondering if the current situation can be compared to the 1930s."

Taus said the Brussels meeting had been planned for some time as part of an ongoing attempt to forge a united political voice for European Jewry.

The Week in Israel

April 22

• An Israeli military court extended by 25 days the detention of Palestinian militia leader Marwan Barghouti. Israel's attorney general, state prosecutor and security services said they would form a joint team to deal with Barghouti's prosecution. Barghouti, head of the Tanzim militia, was arrested in Ramallah last month.

April 23

• Israeli doctors braced for an attempt to oust them from the World Medical Association. The head of the Israel Medical Association, Dr. Yoram Blachar, said he expected anti-Israel resolutions to be presented at the association's upcoming meeting in Geneva.

April 24

• A senior Hamas leader was killed in clashes with the IDF near Hebron.

• Hezbollah fired anti-aircraft shells across Israel's northern border. Shrapnel fell on the town of Shlomi; no one was injured.

April 25

• Nearly all the leaders of Palestinian terror groups in the West Bank have been killed or arrested as a result of Israel's military operation there, according to Maj. Gen. Giora Eiland, head of the IDF's planning branch. But he warned the lull in attacks against Israelis "may not last even months."

April 26

• Israeli forces raided Qalqilyah and three villages in the West Bank in what the army called an anti-terror sweep. Witnesses said about 20 tanks and armoured personnel carriers pushed into Qalqilyah and that soldiers conducted house-to-house searches. The army said troops had detained at least 13 Palestinians "suspected of carrying out terrorist activities against Israeli citizens."

Israel alleges grave-swapping to boost Jenin casualty count

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel has charged that Palestinians are re-interring corpses in an effort to "inflate" the number of fatalities sustained by residents in the Jenin refugee camp during Operation Defensive Shield.

Israeli security sources claim that in recent days, corpses have been taken from cemeteries in Jenin and brought to the common grave where casualties from the refugee camp battles have been buried.

Palestinian spokespersons deny these allegations. The reburials, they say, have been carried out for humanitarian reasons.

Four days ago, they say, six camp residents who were killed in an IDF operation in March were buried at the camp's cemetery. The IDF did not enter the camp in March, but its soldiers surrounded it, and their presence made it impossible for residents to reach the camp's cemetery and bury their dead. The six people slain in March were buried temporarily in plots near a Jenin hospital, the Palestinian spokespersons say.

Israeli officials say that 26 corpses of camp residents have been found. Twenty other bodies of persons killed during recent fighting in Jenin have been exhumed and brought to the camp's common grave.

IDF officers believe that several corpses remain piled under rubble in the centre of the Jenin camp. They believe Palestinian Authority officials might have chosen to delay searches for these bodies, hoping that the bodies will be uncovered when the UN inspection team comes to review recent events in the camp. Discovery of corpses at a time when the UN team is at work in the camp is bound to capture international attention, the Israelis point out.

IDF officers believe the total number of Palestinians killed in gun battles at the camp is between 30 and 70.

Palestinian sources say 54 corpses have been located so far. They say 25 of the people killed in the camp were armed Palestinians who took part in the fighting against the IDF; the remainder, the Palestinians say, were civilians who had no part in the gun battles.

Across town, some 6,000 people gathered to listen to leading French actors and musicians demonstrate against Le Pen, who is fighting his fourth presidential campaign since 1974.

Despite the rallies, Le Pen, who has exploited discontent with mainstream parties, rivalries among opponents and worries over rising crime, has grown in confidence. One of his senior aides said earlier on Sunday the 73-year-old ex-paratrooper thought he could pull off another upset like the one that put him in second place in the first round of the vote.

"It's true. Over the last few days he has believed in it and we do as well," said Bruno Gollnisch, Le Pen's campaign director. "We feel [support] is climbing."

Le Pen himself told the weekend edition of Le Monde that winning "30 per cent of the votes would be a stinging defeat.

"I am fighting for much more. I am aiming more at between 40 and 51 per cent, closer to 51 than 40."

TERRORISTS KILL FOUR:

Four people, including a five-year-old girl, were shot to death in their homes in a morning shooting attack in the West Bank community of Adura, near Hebron; seven other people were seriously wounded. Arik Becker, 22; Danielle Shefi, 5; Katrina Greenberg, 43, and Ya'akov Katz, 51, died when several Palestinian terrorists, reportedly dressed in IDF uniforms, cut through the outer perimeter fence of the community and went on a killing rampage. The gunmen entered a house and opened fire on a couple asleep inside and then went into a second house and opened fire on the children and their mother. They then went out into the street and began targeting passersby, although no one was injured during this part of the attack. The IDF commander of the Hebron region said it was unclear where the gunmen had come from, or where they had fled. In an almost unprecedented directive from the IDF general staff, photographers and reporters were allowed onto the scene soon after the event to enable world media to see the nature and extent of the murders by the Palestinian terrorists. This photo shows the room of five-year-old Shefi, who was killed in her bed.

Hezbollah's deadly mischief

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

During his rounds of shuttle diplomacy in the Mideast last month, U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell tried but failed to persuade Israel and the Palestinians to abide by a ceasefire.

Powell, however, did manage to restore a modicum of calm along Israel's northern border after conferring with the presidents of Lebanon and Syria, Emile Lahoud and Bashar Assad. In whirlwind trips to Beirut and Damascus, he apparently convinced them that daily Hezbollah rocket and mortar attacks against Israeli positions in the disputed Shabaa Farms (Mount Dov) area could ignite a regional war.

Hezbollah, tolerated by Lebanon and encouraged by Syria, launched its latest barrage late in March after Israel reoccupied several towns and some villages in the Palestinian autonomous areas in a bid to stamp out a wave of terrorism.

Hezbollah began firing on Israel out of solidarity with the Palestinians and as part of its campaign to drive Israel out of Shabaa Farms, a small area on the Golan Heights, near Mount Hermon, claimed by Lebanon.

Striking back with artillery fire and air raids, Israel refrained from inflicting particularly heavy blows, hitting neither Lebanon's highly vulnerable infrastructure – power stations, roads and so on – nor Syrian military bases in Lebanon or Syria. Yet Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer warned that "the current situation cannot continue."

Concerned that the cross-border battles might spin out of control and embroil Israel and Syria in an armed confrontation, Powell, as well as UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan, asked Lebanon and Syria to rein in Hezbollah.

Surprisingly enough, Iran – Hezbollah's supporter and arms supplier – exerted similar pressure on Hezbollah.

Bowing to these appeals, Hezbollah's leader, Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah, ordered his guns to fall silent. On April 17, the head of Israeli military intelligence, Gen. Aharon Ze'evi, confirmed that tensions had eased, and that Mount Hermon's ski slopes would be reopened.

But a week later, on April 24, the tranquility was suddenly shattered when Hezbollah lobbed anti-aircraft shells into the Galilee, reportedly in response to Israeli overflights in southern Lebanon. Two days later, four Israeli soldiers were injured by Hezbollah anti-tank rockets.

These incidents reminded observers of a recent period, from February to early March, during which Hezbollah fired anti-aircraft shells into Galilee in response to Israeli overflights.

Nearly two years after Israel's unilateral withdrawal from southern Lebanon, tensions over the status of Shabaa Farms – 17 kilometres in length and two to five kilometres in width – fester.

According to the UN, Shabaa Farms is on the Golan Heights and, therefore, technically on Syrian territory. Hezbollah defiantly contends that Shabaa Farms belongs to Lebanon, a claim supported by the Syrian government.

The UN has called on Israel and Syria to resolve the dispute, but there is a problem here. Israel and Syria broke off bilateral negotiations over the Golan in January 2000, four months before Israel, in compliance with United Nations Resolution 425, pulled its forces out of its self-declared security zone in southern Lebanon.

Given the absence of such talks, Hezbollah has filled the vacuum, targeting Israeli posts on Shabaa Farms. In these attacks, three Israeli soldiers have been killed since November 2000. Hezbollah is also holding the bodies of three Israeli soldiers it kidnapped in October 2000.

(Almost two months ago, six Israelis were killed while travelling on a road near the Lebanese frontier. The Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, a Fatah offshoot, claimed credit).

Under Resolution 425, Lebanon is obliged to patrol the international border with Israel. But with one fleeting exception in early April, the Lebanese army has not made its presence there felt. And so Hezbollah has seized virtual control of southern Lebanon, a tinderbox waiting to explode yet again.

Toronto Jewish Healing Project planning May 22 conference

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Toronto Jewish Healing Project will hold a one-day conference on Judaism and healing titled Job: Perseverance in the Face of Adversity.

Toronto Jewish Healing Project co-ordinator Etta Ginsberg McEwan is one of the organizers of the conference to be held at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, 100 Elder St., May 22, from 8:30 a.m.

McEwan, a former New York social worker, is a commentator on CBC and TVO's half-hour lifestyle program, Moving On. She is also a member of the research ethics committee at the University of Toronto.

Born in Brooklyn, N.Y., McEwan says she was a tomboy who wanted to play baseball or dance ballet. Her dreams were dashed when, at five, after taking a shower in a playground to cool down on a hot August day, she contracted the virus that causes polio.

"There are negative attitudes about people with disabilities and aging because people feel very vulnerable," says McEwan, who gets around in a motorized wheelchair.

Rabbi Joseph Kelman, rabbi emeritus of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue and a longtime worker for the disabled, is the conference moderator.

The keynote speaker is Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Congregation Machzikei Hadas in Ottawa. The author of 32 books, Rabbi Bulka who is also known for his television and radio shows, will speak on Perseverance in the Face of Adversity.

Respondents to the keynote address will be psychologist Sharon Salsberg Ezrin and Rabbi John Moscowitz of Holy Blossom Temple.

Workshops will be offered on a variety of topics, including Kabbalah, prayer, coping with cancer, women's responses to adversity, music and coping skills.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl and Cantor Tobias Gabriel of Beth Tzedec Congregation, will hold a service of healing.

Rabbi Simkha Weintraub, the rabbinic director of the National Centre for Jewish Healing in New York City, has said that Jewish healing seeks to strengthen the spirits of Jews dealing with pain, illness, loss, despair and disruption.

"It seeks to further a sense of wholeness, connectedness, well-being, comfort, guidance, support, insight, meaning, purpose, direction and/or hope, through the spiritual riches of Jewish tradition and Jewish community."

The Toronto Jewish Healing Project, a volunteer organization, holds a one-day conference every other year, sponsors a six-week lecture series, holds group sessions for people who are ill or in despair and presents a monthly healing service at the Lipa Green Building.

For more information on the conference or the Jewish Healing Project, call 416-944-3359 or e-mail, etta2000@sympatico.ca.

NYGH seeking volunteers

TORONTO — North York General Hospital has announced that it needs up to 200 additional volunteers to fill positions that will be available when the new southeast tower opens in October 2003.

"The hospital is expanding to meet the growing health care needs of our community," says Arlene Severin, acting director, volunteer services.

"This means that volunteer services needs more volunteers to help operate the gift shop, information desk and news stand."

The Leslie site redevelopment will increase the size of the hospital by more than 50 per cent. It features a new eight-storey southeast tower and expanded south wing.

The new facility will include expanded operating rooms, labour, birth and recovery suites, neonatal intensive care, critical care, genetics, laboratory and diagnostic imaging areas.

As well, the southeast tower will have an academic centre with a 150-seat auditorium, new main entrance, lobby and retail space.

The hospital currently has more than 1,100 men, women and student volunteers who contributed more than 125,000 hours of service last year across its three sites.

"Volunteers have been an important part of the hospital since its inception," says Severin.

"In 1968, almost 3,000 volunteers conducted door-to-door canvasses, and more than $3 million dollars was raised."

Doreen Taylor, a volunteer for over 35 years is a founding member and past president of volunteer services.

"I have really enjoyed being part of a team that helps make community members' hospital visit more pleasant. Volunteers are active in fund-raising as well as helping in patient care areas and other departments," she says.

"I encourage people to come and find out how they could be a member of our dynamic team of volunteers."

A story of 'incredible' bravery

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

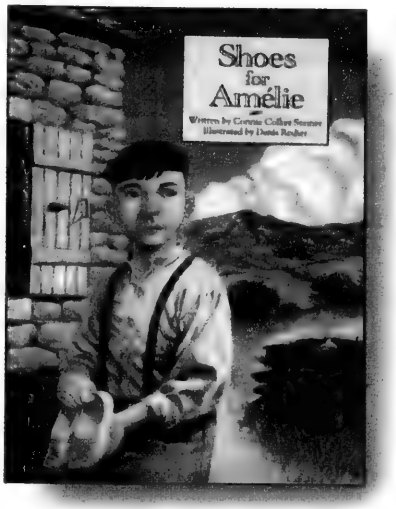
From time to time, people do incredibly brave things, even when it means that they or their families are put in serious danger. Then, even less often, we learn about whole towns who act the same way, purely because it's the right thing to do.

Le Chambon-sur-Lignon, a town near Lyon in France, was that kind of town. During World War II, when the Nazis were rounding up Jews to send them to concentration camps, the people of Le Chambon-sur-Lignon, led by their pastors, André Trocmé and Edouard Theis, hid fleeing Jews in their homes and on their farms.

This was very dangerous, because if the Nazis had caught either the Jews or those who were hiding them, they would have been killed.

Connie Colker Steiner, a writer who lives in Winnipeg, wrote a moving book about that community, called Shoes for Amélie (Lobster Press, 2001).

Denis Rodier, who illustrated the book, shows what a small farming community was like, with stone houses, green fields, rows of vegetables, and trees all around.



Lucien is a small boy who is puzzled by what is going on around him. His older brother, Abel, is always riding off to do things, but he won't take Lucien with him, or even tell him where he is going or what he is doing. Their father is somewhere else, doing something secret. And his mother keeps taking in strangers to sleep in their house, strangers who never stay very long.

Only his grandfather, Pépé, understood how Lucien felt. Because he was old, he was also left out, just like Lucien. He was even too old to do the work he was so good at, making sabots, the wooden shoes that the local people wore.

One night, a little girl came to stay with them. Her name was Amélie. Mother told Lucien to take care of her, and not to ask too many questions.

Lucien, and Abel, when he was around, taught Amélie to collect the eggs from the chickens, to weed plants and to look after the animals in the fields. Amélie was a city girl, but she loved watching what was happening on the farm, and the beautiful scenery.

One day, Lucien and Abel were told to take Amélie into the fields with the animals. Lucien could come home for supper, but Abel and Amélie were to stay in the forest. Mother explained that the police were searching the farms for anyone who wasn't supposed to be there.

Lucien and Amélie went off to play in the forest. Amélie took her prayer book out of her backpack and buried it under a tree, so that no one would find it.

Lucien felt sorry for Amélie, because she missed her family very much, was afraid of what would happen and had terrible nightmares. He decided, with the help of Pépé, to make her a pair of sabots, because her own shoes were not good to wear on a farm. He helped sand the shoes, pressed a design of flower petals onto the toe of each shoe and varnished them.

But when he took them home to Amélie, he found that she had gone, because it was getting too dangerous for her to stay at the farmhouse. Mother and Abel didn't know where she had gone. They didn't know her last name. In fact, they admitted, Amélie wasn't even her right first name.

Lucien ran to the woods where she had buried her prayer book. It too was gone.

You may wonder why the people of Le Chambon-sur-Lignon tried to help people they didn't even know. It was partly because, as descendants of Huguenots, French Protestants who had been harshly persecuted in the past, they wanted to help those being persecuted then.

But there was another reason. The pastor taught them "that we must never do evil, even if it's the law."

The villagers saved more than 5,000 Jews, and a few years ago were honoured by Yad Vashem in Jerusalem for their bravery.

How many differences can you find between the two pictures?

Flowers for Shavuot

"Mommy, could we pick some flowers for Shavuot?"

"Sure, Kaila, you and your brother can pick a nice bouquet for our Shavuot table. Now please try not to disturb me. I've got a lot of cooking to do. The Antebis are coming over tonight, and I've never tried this cheesecake recipe before."

"Yippie!" squealed Kaila and Danny as they ran outside to the garden. "Let's start with these pink ones," decided Danny. "They smell good."

"They're called carnations. Did you bring the scissors?"

"Oops."

"I'll go back and ask Mommy where they are."

"Don't ask Mommy! She said she's busy."

"Oh. What do we do?"

"We don't need scissors. We can just pull them out. Look." With a quick yank, Danny ripped the carnations out by the roots.

"Are you sure I shouldn't go get the scissors?"

"Whaddaya mean? Look how many I have already. Let's get some more. I think Mommy wants more than one kind of flower."

Kaila hesitantly walked over to the daisies. She tried to pull just the flower off, but it came to pieces in her hands.

"That's not the way to do it! You're ruining the flowers! Do it like this!" Clods of earth burst into the air as Daniel gave a mighty pull.

"I think we have enough now."

"You think this is enough? Morah Rachel told us that the reason we have flowers for Shavuot is because when we got the Torah at Mt. Sinai, the whole entire mountain was totally covered with flowers. We're going to need a lot a more than this. There's lots more here! Let's pick them all!"

* * * * * *

"Look Mommy, we have lots of flowers for Shavuot! Enough for the whole house to look like Mt. Sinai!"

"To look like Mt. what?" Mommy put the cheesecake she had just removed from the oven onto the cake rack and turned around. Her mouth fell open as she saw her two muddy children beaming at her from the door, their arms laden with flowers. "What have you done?" she gasped.

"Don't worry, we picked a lot more than this," reassured Danny. "We just couldn't carry them all in. I'll go get the rest now."

"Why did you destroy all these flowers? You pulled them all out by the roots!"

"We were going to ask you for the scissors, Mommy, but you told us not to bother you." explained Kaila.

"Oh, honey, when you pull a plant out by the roots it can't grow any more flowers."

"Oh." Kaila looked like she was about to cry.

Danny looked down at the flowers in his arms. "But Mommy, now our house will look like Mt. Sinai, just like when we got the Torah!"

Mommy walked over and gave her two little angels a big kiss on each of their muddy cheeks. "Let's put these flowers in vases… no, let's use buckets. Then you can wash your hands and faces while I set the table. After that, we're taking a trip to the nursery. I'd like our garden to look like Mt. Sinai too."

Jewish Folk Choir brings Gebirtig to life

TORONTO — Singer Claire Klein Osipov and the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir will bring the Yiddish songs of Mordecai Gebirtig to life at their 76th annual spring concert.

Born in Krakow, Poland in 1877, Gebirtig was murdered by the Nazis in 1942. His songs reflect the joys and sorrows of everyday life in the Jewish communities of pre-World War II Europe – the happiness and tears of family life, nostalgia for lost childhood and empathy for the poor and downtrodden.

Large collections of Gebirtig's songs – which include love stories, calls for vigilance, hope in the face of fascism and, despite the times, humourous tunes – were published in 1920, 1936 and 1946 and he was known to thousands of Jews around the world.

The main work for the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir concert will be Der Zinger fun Noit (The Singer of Misfortune), a dramatized musical montage on the life and works of Gebirtig.

Soloists for the event are Vancouver-based soprano Claire Klein Osipov and tenor John Botten. Actors Sydney Perlmutter and David Abramowitz will narrate in Yiddish and English. Pianists Wendy Bross Stuart and Lina Zemelman will accompany and Esther Ghan Firestone will conduct.

The concert will take place Sunday May 5, 3 p.m. at Havergal College, 1451 Avenue Rd. For further information, call 416-489-7681.

Late Marriage a credit to Israeli cinema

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Late Marriage, which starts its run at the Cineplex chain on May 3, is deft and accomplished.

The first Israeli film in Hebrew and Georgian, it is alternately amusing and ominous.

Dover Kosashvili's movie, which premiered at last year's Toronto International Film Festival, builds to a climax around the tension between modernity and tradition.

Kosashvili, who immigrated to Israel with his family in 1972, uses his background to good effect in this typical story about a bachelor who comes under pressure to enter into matrimony.

The protagonist, Zaza (Lior Louie Ashkenazi), is a 31-year-old philosophy student whose traditional Jewish parents never tire of trying to find him an ideal wife.

To them, she must be pretty, preferably Georgian and, needless to say, a virgin.

What they do not know, and what Zaza is loath to reveal, is that he is already dating Judith (Ronit Elkabezt), a slightly older woman of Moroccan origin and a divorcee with a six-year-old daughter.

To mollify his father (Moni Moshonov) and strong-willed mother (Lili Kosashvili, the director's real-life mother), Zaza pretends to be interested in the eligible young thing to whom he is introduced.

As Late Marriage opens, Zaza is about to meet Ilana (Ava Steinovits Laor), a precocious, sensual 17-year-old who thinks she knows something about man's carnal desires.

Ilana, however, does not meet Zaza's high expectations, and Lili, the quintessential matchmaker, resumes her search for the perfect match.

At this point, the film changes tone as Zaza's parents discover his romantic secret and confront Judith in a scene characterized by contrasting gentle appeals and menacing threats.

Left with no alternative, Zaza must sort out the mess he has created.

Late Marriage, which is sexually explicit, oscillates between comedy and drama as the demands of Zaza's family clash with his own inclinations.

Lior Louie Ashkenazi in a scene from Late Marriage.

This is an appealing film, not just because the performances are naturalistic, but because Kosashvili directs with a sure, steady hand that belies his inexperience as a director.

Late Marriage, charged with high drama and subtle humour, is a credit to Israeli cinema.

A series of photographs of Canadian writers by Danielle Schaub, an Israeli photographer and professor of literature, goes on view this week at David Mirvish Books.

The 100 literary portraits include images of Andre Alexis, Margaret Atwood, Barry Callaghan, Mavis Gallant, Alistair MacLeod, Anne Michaels, Michael Ondaatje and 93 other Canadian authors. They are black and white and range from unposed and candid portraits to documentary pictures. They are being shown in Toronto for the first time.

Schaub lives in Haifa, where she teaches Canadian literature and other subjects. She was born in the Sultanate of Brunei and raised in Holland, Venezuela, Argentina, Gabon, England and Belgium. She began taking photographs of Canadian writers in 1998.

An accompanying exhibit features photographs that Torontonian John Sebert took for Canadian magazines from 1954 to 1965.

Runs May 1 to July 1 at 596 Markham St. Opening, Tuesday, May 7, 5 to 8 p.m. with artists in attendance. 416-531-9975, www.dmbooks.com

Debut CD from Edmonton: Today I Lit A Candle, a new eight-song demo CD by Edmonton resident Paula Eve Kirman, includes several songs that deal with contemporary social issues, such as the title track about the 1989 Montreal massacre.

Two songs, Shoah and That's My Boy, have a decidedly Jewish theme. The latter is the story of an Israeli soldier who is killed in the line of duty, told from the point of view of his mother.

Kirman, a freelance writer and Web designer, has been playing guitar and writing songs since her childhood. Last summer, a musical friend encouraged her to record some of her original compositions in a studio. "I am not a natural-born singer but I felt this was something I was led to do," she says.

Feinstein & Israel Philharmonic: Michael Feinstein, one of the top interpreters of the popular American song, has recorded a Concord-label CD with the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra.

Feinstein With The Israel Philharmonic Orchestra marks the first time the singer-pianist has recorded with a symphony orchestra. The recording contains lush and inventive treatments of a dozen veteran American standards. The 88-piece orchestra was led by Alan Broadbent, who provided most of the arrangements.

Selections include Stormy Weather, The Folks Who Live On The Hill, By Myself, Guess I'll Hang My Tears Out To Dry and Laura; the latter features an orchestration by David Raskin, its 89-year old composer. The CD is due in stores May 7.

Beth Sholom to feature three musical genres

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Beth Sholom Synagogue will present a star-studded concert of Broadway pop and cantorial music on Thursday, May 9, at 8 p.m.

Titled New York Night, the concert will feature Broadway artists Sean McDermott and Glory Crampton, contemporary singer Gershon Veroba, Cantor Eric Moses of Beth Sholom and a full string orchestra.

"The concert is sure to be a sellout as was last year's concert," says Howard Orfus, concert chair and its producer and director. "The entertainers are very high calibre and this will be a very exciting show, not to be missed."

McDermott, who played Chris in the Broadway production of Miss Saigon and Danny Zuko in the hit Broadway revival of Grease, and who has appeared in productions of West Side Story, South Pacific and Carousel, will headline the concert.

Crampton, a lyric soprano, will perform as a soloist, as well as with McDermott. She was the original Christine in Phantom of the Opera on Broadway. Crampton has performed with Jose Carreras, as well as the Three Tenors, and has appeared frequently at Radio City Music Hall in New York.

She has performed throughout North America and Europe. The New York Times describes her "silvery soprano" as "an angel's voice, exquisite in every detail."

Veroba, who lives in Far Rockaway, N.Y., brings a change of pace to the show. The pop singer, who is described as a combination of Neil Diamond, Billy Joel, Barry Manilow and Elton John, performs regularly on stage, TV, and radio. He has appeared with world-renowned artists, including Jon Voight, Sid Ceasar, and the late Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach. Veroba does it all – Hebrew, chassidic, Motown, and more.

Further balancing musical genres will be Moses, a graduate of the Tel Aviv Cantorial Institute whose singing expresses passion with exceptional control.

Born in Sudbury, Ont., he has appeared in concert in Europe and Israel, and across North America. He has also released a CD titled Moses Sings and officiated at the worldwide Yom HaShoah memorial service at Auschwitz-Birkenau in 2000.

For information or tickets ($60), call Beth Sholom at 416-783-6103.

All aboard the Chattanooga Choo-Choo Express

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

CHATTANOOGA, Tenn. — Learning to canoe with Jewish American, Olympic Paddling Gold Medallist Joe Jacobi is just one of the many experiences to be had in this south-eastern Tennessee city, made famous by The Glenn Miller Orchestra's song – The Chattanooga Choo Choo.

When Jacobi isn't training for the upcoming 2004 Summer Olympic Games in Athens, he makes himself available to clients of Outdoor Chattanooga [www.outdoorchattanooga.com]- an internet-based consortium, that custom-packages adventures like kayaking, sky diving, whitewater rafting, rock climbing and even bird watching – for those a little less adventurous.

Ten years ago, industrial Chattanooga was a place you probably wanted to bypass while driving on Interstate-75. Then, in 1992, some philanthropists with vision built The Tennessee Aquarium at Tennessee River Park. This resulted in not only reclaiming the riverfront, but acted as a catalyst for the revitalization of downtown Chattanooga.

The Tennessee Aquarium is the first and largest freshwater aquarium in the world. By 1996, the privately funded operation opened an IMAX 3D Theatre and Environmental Learning Lab.

There are a lot of places to see in the downtown area, made simple to get to by free rides on the environmentally friendly, electric shuttle buses. Stops of interest include Warehouse Row, a large grouping of outlet stores with good prices, right in the heart of the city.

Chattanooga is where the tow truck was invented. The International Towing & Recovery Museum is dedicated to these vehicles. In addition to some wonderfully restored vintage models, also on display is a children's bright red tow wagon.

Other attractions include the Creative Discovery Museum – especially fun for the kids with interactive exhibits including musical instruments that you can play, just by pressing buttons. The Chattanooga African-American Museum and the Bessie Smith Hall of Fame is named in honour of the late blues singing legend who hailed from the area.

Coolidge Park with its brightly coloured indoor carousel attracts visitors and locals alike. Nearby, is a century old steel truss called Walnut Street Bridge, it is the longest pedestrian walkway-bridge in the world. A relaxing way to explore the neighbourhood is aboard the Southern Belle Riverboat; afternoon and evening cruises are available.

The quaint Bluff View Art District and Sculpture Garden are minutes from downtown on the south bluffs of the Tennessee River. Cultural attractions include the Hunter Museum of American Art and the neighbouring Houston Museum of Decorative Arts. The River Gallery is an art buyer's paradise, guaranteed to take a nice bite out of your Canadian dollar - but for the most part, well worth it.

Lookout Mountain overlooks both Chattanooga and the Tennessee Valley. Attractions on the mountain include Ruby Falls, with its breathtaking calcite formations, and the Incline Railway, dubbed "America's Most Amazing Mile". For the best rush, take it going down.

Some of Lookout Mountain's most interesting attractions overlooking Chattanooga are in fact, in the state of Georgia. Rock City is where miniature golf was invented. Its paths lead visitors to ancient rock formations, beautiful gardens and grazing. Lookout Mountain was the scene of some pretty bloody Civil War Battles. You can witness history at the Chickamuauga Battlefield in Georgia or Tennessee's Point Park & Lookout Mountain Battlefield. In fact, don't be surprised to find Civil War buffs in period costume re-enacting battles.

The Tennessee Valley Railroad Museum introduces visitors to the golden age of railroading. Be sure to board restored Engine 610 for a leisurely ride up and down the track.

Accommodations of note in Chattanooga include the charming family owned, Bluff View Inn. The Chattanoogan is an exquisite property owned by the city complete with a full service spa. On the other side of the tracks, so to speak, is the Chattanooga Choo Choo Holiday Inn. This hotel's main lobby once was a terminal for the well-known station. Guests of the hotel can choose between a conventional room or suite, or opt for a stay in an old train car. You can even ride the hotel's short track rails and get a little history lesson from their own Choo Choo conductor.

Although a number of Snowbirds have discovered Chattanooga on their drive to Florida, US Airways offers an easy flight connection through their Charlotte, N.C. hub.

For more information on Chattanooga call, 1-800-322-3344 or on the web at: www.chattanoogafun.com.

The thrill of enjoying a Passover seder in Kathmandu

By BEATRICE MAGDER
Special to The CJN

How would you like to take part in a Paasover seder with 850 people? I did, and even though it was four years ago, I will never forget the experience!

On a visit to Nepal in 1998, I was offered the opportunity to teach English in a small school in Kathmandu. I happily accepted, especially when I was invited to live with the family of the headmaster.

In April, I went to the Israeli Embassy to ask about the possibility of attending a Passover seder. I was told there would be a seder at the embassy. It would cost 1,000 rupees – about $20.

In Kathmandu, I lived with a Hindu family in which both parents are teachers. They have four children. I was becoming familiar with a Hindu household and with Nepalese culture. However, all my life I had taken part in a seder, and given the opportunity, I wanted to attend. Of course, I was also curious to see how it would be carried out in a far-away country like Nepal.

The embassy had a very large garden at the front and side of the building. A huge double tent was set up in the garden.

I could hardly believe my eyes when I entered the tent! There were hundreds of people, some sitting around tables, others sitting on chairs set up everywhere.

The language I heard around me was Hebrew, not because we were in the Israeli Embassy, but because almost all the people there were young Israelis. There were just a few English speaking people like me, and looking around, I felt sure that I probably was one of the oldest there. Certainly no other head of white hair like mine could be seen.

Most of the young people had been travelling in India or trekking in Nepal. One way or another, they had discovered that there was to be a seder in Kathmandu at the Israeli Embassy. Some young Israeli men and women I spoke to had interrupted their trekking or travelling to come for the seder. Some had arranged their travel plans in order to be there.

Many had just completed their military training in Israel and were travelling around before returning to go on with their education or to get into a job or career. About 10,000 Israelis go to Nepal each year – the largest group of foreign tourists in Nepal.

I found out later that there were 850 people at this seder. In previous years, there had been as many as 1,200, but this year there was also a seder in another small city, Pokara, which is the important jumping off place for treks. There they had 450 people.

Now, make no mistake. This was a full seder, just as it would be at your family table. Haggadahs brought from New York had an introduction by Toronto Rabbi Immanuel Schochet. The kosher food was brought from New York by the Chabad Lubavitch in Brooklyn. About 50 volunteers were involved in preparing the food. The wine, which flowed plentifully, and the matzot came from Israel. The embassy's Eitan Levy and his wife circulated, weaving among the tables and chairs, greeting and chatting with the people there. Their youngest daughter sang the Four Questions, standing on a table in the middle. She turned in a different direction for each question.

There was lots of singing during the readings from the Haggadah and some participants even managed to get up and dance in the tight space.

For me, one of the astounding things was that the seder proceeded as if we were around a family table, and we had all the symbolic food: karpas, maror, charoset potato and salt water, greens, and, of course, lots of matzah and wine. Everything was done as I have always known it. The leader, up on a table, shouting to be heard by all, was one of the Chabad Lubavitchers. The language of communication, in addition to the Haggadah material, was Hebrew. I had to get someone near me to translate.

Then came the food. Again, I could have been at home as the gefilte fish with horseradish served by Nepalese waiters carrying huge rice straw trays was followed by chicken soup and knaidlach. Then came chicken and vegetables and the rest of the usual seder meal. All of this for 850 people! It was really quite a stupendous sight to see all this food and all the people enjoying it, along with plentiful amounts of wine.

It was a night for me to carry back home with me and share with family and friends. A night to ensure my own particular kind of continuing Yiddishkeit by taking part in a seder.

Singing the praises of Tupperware at Hot Docs

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Lifetime Guarantee: Phranc's Adventure in Plastic, a quirky romp into the realm of Tupperdom, sheds light on a well-worn niche of American capitalism.

Lisa Udelson's 58-minute film can be seen at Hot Docs (the Canadian International Documentary Festival) on May 4 at 7:15 p.m. at the Royal Cinema (608 College).

At its centre is Phranc, a Tupperware sales star who describes herself as an "All American Jewish lesbian folksinger."

A former punk musician whose butch appearance distills the essence of her personality, Phranc is a devotee and organizer of Tupperware parties, whose raison d'etre, as always, is the bottom line.

Phranc, who looks like a man and speaks like a woman, works in Los Angeles, winning over audiences by strumming catchy Tupperware songs on a guitar.

Extolling the durability of Tupperware, she sings the praises of a product that does not chip, crack, scratch, peel or absorb odours.

Udelson follows Phranc all over town, from Tupperware parties in suburbs to a Pacific Ocean beach where she surfs, and to a glittering conference in Las Vegas.

Punctuated by corny 1950s Tupperware promotion films, Lifetime Guarantee draws a sympathetic portrait of a driven woman and offers a giddy glimpse into a hyper commercial world.

The Settlers, by Ruth Walk, portrays the nationalistic Jews of Tel Rumeideh, a tumbledown Jewish enclave in Hebron.

This Israeli film focuses on a handful of religiously Orthodox woman who are utterly devoted to Hebron in particular and to the West Bank in general.

Being hardliners who fervently believe that Judea and Samaria belong to the Jewish people, they do not care for the Palestinian Arabs in whose midst they reside.

As The Settlers winds down, shots ring out. The second Palestinian uprising has begun, an event that may well change the lives of Hebron's Jews.

The Settlers was screened on April 29.

This year's Hot Docs, which runs from April 26 to May 5, features more than 100 films from 14 countries.

For tickets, call 416-538-8282. Hot Doc's Internet address is www.hotdocs.ca.

Salesman actor evokes the dreamer in every father

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Entering the confused and disheartened mind of Willy Loman can be a daunting task for any actor. But Allan Price's inspiring portrayal of the failing salesman steals the show in the production of Arthur Miller's Death of a Salesman, playing at the Toronto Centre for the Arts until May 4.

The lyrical text of the Miller masterpiece is well known, but every drama company presenting the play must walk a fine theatrical line: too much emotion will divert the narrative flow, and too little passion will produce a wooden, amateur piece. Except for lapses into overacting by some of the actors at the performance I attended, Tribal Productions stages the play with dramatic balance and impressive fearlessness.

The production's most stirring presence is Price's Willy Loman, the down-on-his-luck New York salesman with suicidal tendencies and a penchant for the past. As Willy's mind descended further into depression, Price never resorted to King Lear-type mumblings. Rather, Price took a page out of Jack Lemmon's book (who portrayed another desperate salesman in the film Glengarry Glen Ross) and peppered his performance with wistful sighs and slumped shoulders. At the staging I saw, Price even threw in the odd fatigued "Oy" during the first half of the play.

When the second half forced Price to show Willy's angry side, the unleashed emotion further hypnotized the audience in the centre's quaint Studio Theatre. Biff Loman's love-tinged spite sparked the overpowering rage that Price played to perfection, while flashbacks to scenes of fatherly exuberance softened the salesman. When Willy reminded himself of his son's potential, his own failings were momentarily forgotten, only to return when money matters arise.

His confession that sales contacts "don't know me anymore" was spoken with the same evocative tenderness as the prophetic line, "Sometimes, it's better for a man to just walk away."

Other cast members were also quite strong. Samuel Owen as Biff Loman slid into scenes of anxiety or anger with intensity, and George Joyce as Ben Loman maintained an appropriate stone-blank face of reason opposite Price's performance.

But some of the supporting cast should learn from Price's balance. Barbara Muller, who plays Linda Loman, overacted her lines with exaggerated facial expressions, and Mark Cameron Fraser as Happy Loman whined his way through his character's imprudence.

Yet, Eli Lukawitz's direction magically deflected the acting flubs with seamless scene changes and winning stage movements.

Death of a Salesman relies on flashbacks in its narrative, and they can be tricky to execute. But yellow-hued lighting coupled with Price's boyish smiles subtly triggered the flashbacks.

Ultimately, though, this story of blame and helplessness hinges on the character of Willy Loman and Price delivered. He successfully evoked the dreamer in every burdened father or husband, in a performance that was, by turns, both sympathetic and unforgiving.

Tribal Productions is a professional non-profit theatre group founded in 1994 by Eli Lukawitz and Sam Rosenthal. It's the resident theatre company at the Toronto Centre for the Arts.

But that is not the end of my story. I said I lived with a Hindu family and I was treated very much as a member of that family, often called grandma.

The day after the seder was a special one for many Hindus. Two festivals were taking place in different parts of the city. And I was taken to both of these to observe and enjoy my Hindu family's participation. One of these two festivals was especially for women, and the long line of women dressed in beautiful red saris, carrying their covered trays of offerings to the temple was a sight to behold. And I had the benefit of explanations of everything from Deepak and Sunita, my Kathmandu family.

It all made for a very interesting life!

Business Profile

Putting trust into the world of real estate

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Here's a quandary to test the mettle of any experienced investor, circa 1993.

You've sunk a fair chunk of change into the real estate market – specifically, in a real estate mutual fund – and land prices have taken a beating. It's been that way for a few years and the prospects of unlocking any value in your investment appear remote.

Representatives of the mutual fund contact you and put forward two options. They're planning to restructure the fund and your choices are: A. have an independent investment bank value your stake in the fund and be bought out; or B. convert your interest into something new, into units in a real estate investment trust (REIT).

Remember, it's 1993 and REITs are uncharted territory in Canada, though by that point they'd had a two-year run in the United States.

Consider also that if you were typical of the mutual fund owner, you were a senior citizen with some of your retirement money invested on the expectation that real estate was safe with steadily escalating property values that offered higher returns than you could get elsewhere.

At the time, Edward Sonshine wasn't sure what the mutual fund investors would do, but as president of Counsel Corporation's property division, it was obvious that the old ways of doing business would have to change.

In November 1993, the mutual fund holders agreed to convert their interest into units of Counsel REIT and in January 1994 the trust started trading on the TSE at $5 per unit, its liquidation value.

In mid-1995 the trust changed its name and RioCan REIT was born. The name Rio takes its name from the three segments of the real estate market that were initially targeted for growth – residential, industrial and office. Can is short for Canada.

Today, Sonshine looks back on those stressful times and is thankful most investors voted to keep their money in real estate.

While Counsel's mutual fund investors were faced with difficult decisions, the economic downturn had also left Sonshine pondering his future. A lawyer by training with a specialty in real estate and property development, he had glided effortlessly from the legal profession to the business world as president of Counsel Corporations' real estate division.

But around 1990 the recession hit hard and the company entered into two or three difficult years, prompting a wholesale re-evaluation of its business model. At one point Sonshine considered returning to the practice of law.

But his knowledge of real estate and the relationships he had formed prompted him to give the sector another chance.

Today the president and CEO of RioCan is philosophical about those tough years, saying "whatever doesn't kill you makes you stronger."

Despite its name, RioCan has focused exclusively on commercial space and since its inception, the trust has grown from assets of less than $100 million to more than $2.7 billion, with a compounded annual rate of growth of 20 to 23 per cent a year.

Real estate REITs, like oil and gas trusts and those in other industries, invest in mature industries and return much of their income to unit holders in monthly cash distributions. In addition to the annual yields, investment trusts pack the added punch of tax deferral and savings. In 2001, 54 per cent of the distribution was considered income and fully taxable, but 14 per cent was capital gain (from the sale of property) and 31 per cent was considered return of capital. The latter went to reduce the investor's cost base, meaning that when the units are eventually sold, part of the annual returns would be considered a capital gain and taxed at a lower rate than either investment income or dividends.

RioCan's success marked a major shift in the entire industry. Where once the real estate market was dominated by developer/landlords like TrizecHahn, Oxford Properties, Brookfield and Olympia and York, today REITs are the dominant players in residential, industrial and office space, Sonshine said.

The approach for the two business models is quite different, he explained. REITs like RioCan don't just build real estate and expect tenants to buy in. "We only build when it's pre-leased. We don't build 'spec space' that we hope will be leased when it's finished," he said.

Where the focus of developers was on "mega-malls," RioCan developed a different approach. Instead of a suburban mall with a few big tenants and populated by a large number of retail outlets, RioCan focused on much smaller shopping centres, from 100,000 to 1 million square feet. Instead of dozens of stores anchored by one or two big retailers, the RioCan model stressed 10 to 15-store developments with a supermarket at one end and other quality retailers throughout.

Edward Sonshine

"We own 150 of them today," Sonshine said.

Located primarily in the suburbs, the malls feature high passenger traffic, fewer tenants, little turnover and longer term leases. RioCan's top revenue tenant is Wal-Mart, followed by Zellers, A & P, Famous Players and Loblaws. Almost 96 per cent of its 23 million square feet of space is leased. Two-thirds of the trust's assets are located in Ontario, 10 per cent in Alberta, a little over nine per cent in Quebec, with smaller number of properties spread across the rest of Canada.

In the early 1990s, it was far from clear the RioCan model would prevail. "There was a debate which way to go," Sonshine said. "The debate is over. We won. Virtually all the big real estate operators are gone."

The reason, as far as he is concerned, is simple. "They couldn't hold their shareholders. They want cash flow."

RioCan, for its part, paid $1.08 per unit last year. Last week is was paying $1.11 on a unit price of $12.12 for a yield of 9.1 per cent.

No doubt, that's a return that RioCan's original unit holder can be happy with. Back in the early '90s, Sonshine agonized over the financial hit the mutual fund holders would take if the trust model failed.

"I felt responsible for retirees with savings in the mutual fund...I take it very seriously. It's a tremendous responsibility," said Sonshine, the child of Holocaust survivors.

Prior to launching RioCan, Sonshine and the RioCan brain trust analyzed the failed mutual fund model, the drop in real estate values and the bankruptcy of tenants and devised a set of rules and strategies to avoid those problems.

RioCan would avoid the main bane of the '80s – high debt levels– by limiting debt to 50 per cent of the cost of properties (raised to 55 per cent in 2001); it would focus on one area of commercial real estate – shopping centres – to the exclusion of others. ("That way, you can really build the expertise in house and you can be really good at it," Sonshine said.)

It would stay away from risk as much as possible and so, avoid owning undeveloped land. It would opt for long-term fixed rates of interest in the money it borrowed (with an average time to maturity of six years) and it would lease to reliable national tenants locked into long-term leases, "for whom the world would have to fall apart for them not to pay the rent."

With that model to work with, RioCan has been able to both grow and make substantial distributions to unit holders.

RioCan's success, has no doubt take some of the pressure off Sonshine, whose worries today are how to grow the company, not whether seniors will have enough for retirement.

Bellman said the security guard maintains he politely asked Abergel to put his flag away and told him that if he refused he would be put under arrest for a prohibited act.

(Hasler said the mall's standing policy is to prohibit the display of all flags in the mall. "We do not permit protests or demonstrations inside the Rideau Centre. If someone comes in with a Canadian flag, we would ask them to fold it. It's a public safety issue," he said, adding flags could cause strife inside the mall between opposing groups. The mall also has a policy of prohibiting photographs without permission, he said.)

Bellman said the security guard "denied vehemently" telling Abergel to put the "f...g flag away," and he rejected allegations he made racist remarks.

Bellman said police will have to find third party witnesses to what transpired in the public portion of the mall.

Hasler, meanwhile, said racist statements, if they were made, are "really troubling. If there were racist statements, that is totally unacceptable to Rideau Centre.

"We are extremely troubled by the whole thing. It is something that is foreign to our experience here. Our policy is completely non discriminatory."

In the event of racist statements being proven, "appropriate action will be taken and it will be decisive action," Hasler said.

Meanwhile, in Montreal, "the level of concern, anger and anguish is very high," said David Birnbaum, executive-director of the Quebec Region of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Just a few days earlier, the owner of a Second Cup coffee shop in Montreal refused to serve several people who were carrying an Israeli flag following a pro-Israel rally.

The incidents come as Jewish communities around the world are experiencing a surge of anti-Semitic incidents, including synagogue bombings (including one in Saskatoon), assaults and vicious propaganda attacks.

"It's a time that the community in Montreal and Canada are very vigilant and quite concerned about the current atmosphere. There's no doubt that tensions in the Middle East are at risk of being imported to communities around the world," Birnbaum said.

FIFA to vote on Israel's suspension

By ELI SHVIDLER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The executive of FIFA, the world soccer governing body, will consider a plea to suspend Israel at its next meeting on May 3. FIFA is responding to requests from several Arab soccer organizations that have asked to have Israel ostracized because of its conflict with the Palestinians.

Meanwhile, UEFA, the European soccer federation, has rejected a call by a number of Arab countries – specifically, Jordan, Syria, Oman, Libya and Kuwait – to suspend Israel.

"We will continue to monitor the situation in Israel and follow the guidelines laid down by the United Nations," said UEFA president Lennart Johansson. "We will consider each case on a match-by-match basis but there are no grounds for a suspension at this stage."

FIFA sources later said the world governing body would likely take the same position as UEFA.

Last month the Saudis sent a letter to FIFA on behalf of the Arab Football Union in which they called on FIFA President Sepp Blatter "to protect the interests of the Palestinian FA – a full member of FIFA, which has been harmed by Israeli actions." Jordan, Kuwait, Syria, Lebanon and Oman added their names to the letter.

FIFA's move to discuss suspending Israel is likely connected to Blatter's bid for re-election in a vote on the eve of the World Cup finals in Seoul on May 29. Blatter's standing as the most important functionary in the world's most important sport has taken a severe knock lately following allegations of corruption and mismanagement.

Even if the move to suspend Israel fails, Blatter realizes he must pick up votes, especially from Third World countries, if he is to fend off a challenge to his leadership from Cameroon's Issa Hayatou, the African confederation chief, who is also standing for election in Seoul.

The 24 members of FIFA's executive committee will vote on the proposed boycott. Secretary general Michel Zen-Ruffinen, who has recently fallen out with his boss, will also take part in the discussion but is not allowed to vote.

The balance of power in the committee appears to suggest the proposal has only a slim chance of being adopted. Apart from Blatter, there are eight European members of the committee, three of whom are vice-presidents. All of them, except perhaps Belgium's Michel D'Hooghe, are expected to vote against the proposal.

UEFA president Johansson and Italian Antonio Matarrese are long-standing friends of Israel, as is Scotland's David Will. All of them are expected to adopt the UEFA line, which invariably opposes FIFA and its boss, Blatter.

South Korea's Chung Mong-Joon, Julio Grondona, the president of the Argentina FA, and Jack Warner, president of CONCACAF, the soccer federation for North and Central America and the Caribbean, are also not expected to support the proposal.

Other members also expected to vote against are Spain's Angel Maria Vilar Llona, Brazil's Ricardo Teixeira and Chuck Blazer of the U.S.

Votes in favour will undoubtedly come from the representatives of Saudi Arabia, Tunisia, Qatar, Botswana and Mali.

Israel Football Association chair Gavri Levy sent an urgent personal letter to Blatter last week and also asked for a meeting as soon as possible before the committee convenes.

"We will act swiftly and decisively and I hope that it will all come to nothing, but in the disgusting world in which we live, anything is possible," Levy said.

Bridge with Gitelman

As Canadians, we know that one of the most exciting moments in sport is when a goal is scored in a Hockey playoff game that has gone into overtime. If you don't think that a bridge tournament is capable of evoking the same kind of suspense and drama, then watch this:

The year was 1993. I was 28 years old and playing on Team Canada in one of my first major international bridge tournaments - the Maccabiah Games in Tel Aviv (where bridge has long been considered a sport). After almost a week of play, 12 teams had been reduced to four. Canada faced Israel in one semi-final match while Great Britain did battle with the United States in the other semi-final.

Our 128-deal match against the Israelis ended in an exact tie, a very rare occurrence in a bridge tournament. The conditions of contest called for eight overtime deals. Canada had not done well on the first seven of these deals. We knew we needed a good result on the last deal to have a chance to win the match:

Geoff	Fred	The bidding:
♠ QJ3	♠ K754	Fred	Geoff
♥ Q965	♥ K	1♦	1♥
♦ 932	♦ AKQ654	1♠	2♦
♣ 542	♣ KJ	3NT

I was the declarer in 3NT after some questionable bidding by both my partner, Geoff Hampson, and myself. My only excuse for the dreadful contract that we reached is that we knew we could not win the match if we played in a partscore.

If my left hand opponent had led a club, the unbid suit, then 3NT would have had no chance. He chose to lead a heart, however, and I gratefully won the first trick with my ♥K. I played six rounds of diamonds. Both defenders followed twice, discarded two small spades, and then two small hearts. I continued with a spade to dummy's Queen and my right hand opponent's Ace. The inevitable low club was returned and then time stood still.

I had a decision to make and I knew that I had better make the right decision if Canada was going to win the match! Playing the ♣J would win if the ♣Q was on my right. Playing the ♣K would win if the ♣A was on my right. What card should I play? I sat there and I thought and thought and thought…

It seemed like a complete guess. The opponents had not given anything away with their discards, tempo, or mannerisms. I could think of only one thing on which to base my decision – the heart opening lead. Why had my left hand opponent not led a club? Perhaps he had the ♣A and did not want to give me an undeserved trick with the ♣K (which I was likely to have from the bidding).

I really did not want to play a card at all, but eventually I convinced myself to play the ♣J, hoping it would draw the ♣A. Well, it drew the ♣Q and a club was returned to the ♣A on my right. The defense had the rest of the tricks. I was down two in 3NT and Canada lost the match. Israel went on to defeat Great Britain, thereby winning the Gold Medal at the 1993 Maccabiah.

And in bridge, as in hockey, when you get knocked out of the playoffs, there is always next season to look forward to…

Where were the rest?

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

Irwin Cotler was there (but then, Irwin Cotler is nearly everywhere). Where were Canada's four other Jewish members of Parliament and five Jewish senators at the recent rally for Israel in Ottawa? Where was a statement of welcome on behalf of the prime minister? Why no representation from any of the opposition parties? (Okay, we can do without the NDP, at least these days.)

Questions...

I concede that the last thing almost any Jewish gathering needs is more speakers, but one must note the conspicuous absences from the April 21 Ottawa rally of Jewish MPs Elinor Caplan, Anita Neville, Jacques Saada and Raymonde Folco. Were they lost in the crowd of 25,000? Doubtful. If there, they likely would have been on the dais, even if they were not slated to speak.

So too should the absences of the Jewish senators be noted: Jack Austin, Jerry Grafstein, Leo Kolber, Mira Spivak and Richard Kroft. Again, their presence would surely have been acknowledged by the speakers had they attended and shown their support for Israel when it's needed most. Senators have a low enough profile as it is and they abide by a different, perhaps more sober, set of rules when it comes to partisanship. But you'd think they might want to show their faces from time to time and take a stand that risks upsetting none of their constituents, since they don't have any.

Now, as a cabinet-minister, Caplan is bound by altogether different rules than a regular MP. The cabinet, after all, runs the country and sets the tone for debate. Not much room for one-sided declarations. Of course, that didn't stop a florid Caplan from declaring during the last federal election that the Canadian Alliance was a haven for "Holocaust deniers, prominent bigots and racists." But that was during an election campaign. Assigning the same epithets to those who now seek to murder Caplan's brethren is apparently off limits.

The absence of Jewish representatives was not a failing of the rally's organizers. Canadian Jewish Congress tells me that invitations went out to all Jewish members of Parliament, local politicians and the 47 MPs who make up the Canada-Israel Parliamentary Friendship Group. Organizers lament that so few politicians showed up at all, never mind the Jewish ones. (For the record, Toronto-area Liberal Joe Volpe was there and spoke. Cynics might say this is because Volpe has a large Jewish constituency, but as a cynic, I don't believe that. I really think his heart is in the right place.)

As for a letter of welcome from the Prime Minister's Office: This would have been a small but nice touch. It was not to be; curious, given how warmly Jean Chrétien lauded Israel four years ago at the country's 50th anniversary celebrations at Ontario Place. Now that Israel is in real danger and has turned to its friend Canada for help on the international stage, it's a different story.

To be fair, the rally was hastily organized. MPs' schedules are made up weeks in advance, and weekends (the rally was on a Sunday) are almost always when members journey back to their ridings for constituency work. On the other hand, the Quebec ridings of Saada and Folco are less than two hours from Ottawa. And Folco attended (but did not address) the recent rally for Israel held in Montreal.

Neville, a rookie MP from Winnipeg, was also a no-show at the huge April 14 rally for Israel held on the steps of the Manitoba legislature – a 15-minute drive from her riding.

All this strikes me as alarming and sad at the same time, and brings to mind an old saw: Sometimes, issues are too important to be left to politicians.

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

In the early '90s, I worked for the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee in Siberia. Knowing that our post-Soviet brothers and sisters were natural readers, we preceded our first visits with shipments of libraries, Russian-language books of Judaic and Zionist content.

On my first trip to Khabarovsk, I found about 15,000 Jews who were fast making aliyah. Some, however, chose to stay and build a community. When I arrived, there was only one woman who had taught herself enough Hebrew to teach the children the alephbet. Judaism and its rich heritage were both a fantasy and a Soviet-era stigma.

The Hebrew teacher challenged me about one of the books we sent. She read the six chapters of Pirkei Avot over and over, but she couldn't believe it was a Jewish text. It was too noble, too civilized. I was shocked that she was so stigmatized by her recent Soviet past, but delighted at the way she found this ancient jewel of ours and immediately understood its enduring beauty and purpose.

Some months later, in a New York hotel, I was decorating the walls with posters we had created for Russian Jewish classrooms, preparing the room for a meeting of the JDC's lay leadership. An influential women in that leadership approached me and asked about a specific poster. "It's beautiful, Epi, but what is it?" I explained that it was one of our new classroom posters. "Yes, but what is it? What does it say?" I was shocked and embarrassed to realize that this famous American Jewess did not recognize the Hebrew alphabet.

Here was a powerful and committed Jew with no Jewish knowledge. She was raised with all of the comforts and luxuries of a wonderful general education in a country where Jewish schools and synagogues are freely available, but she hadn't learned the basics.

My Russian friend, on the other hand, had discovered her Jewishness in the most barren environment and had already learned to speak the language, read the letters and appreciate the noble beauty of our most cherished literary treasures.

This being the season of Pirkei Avot, I suggest you try to read a chapter as if you just found this jewel of our heritage for the first time.

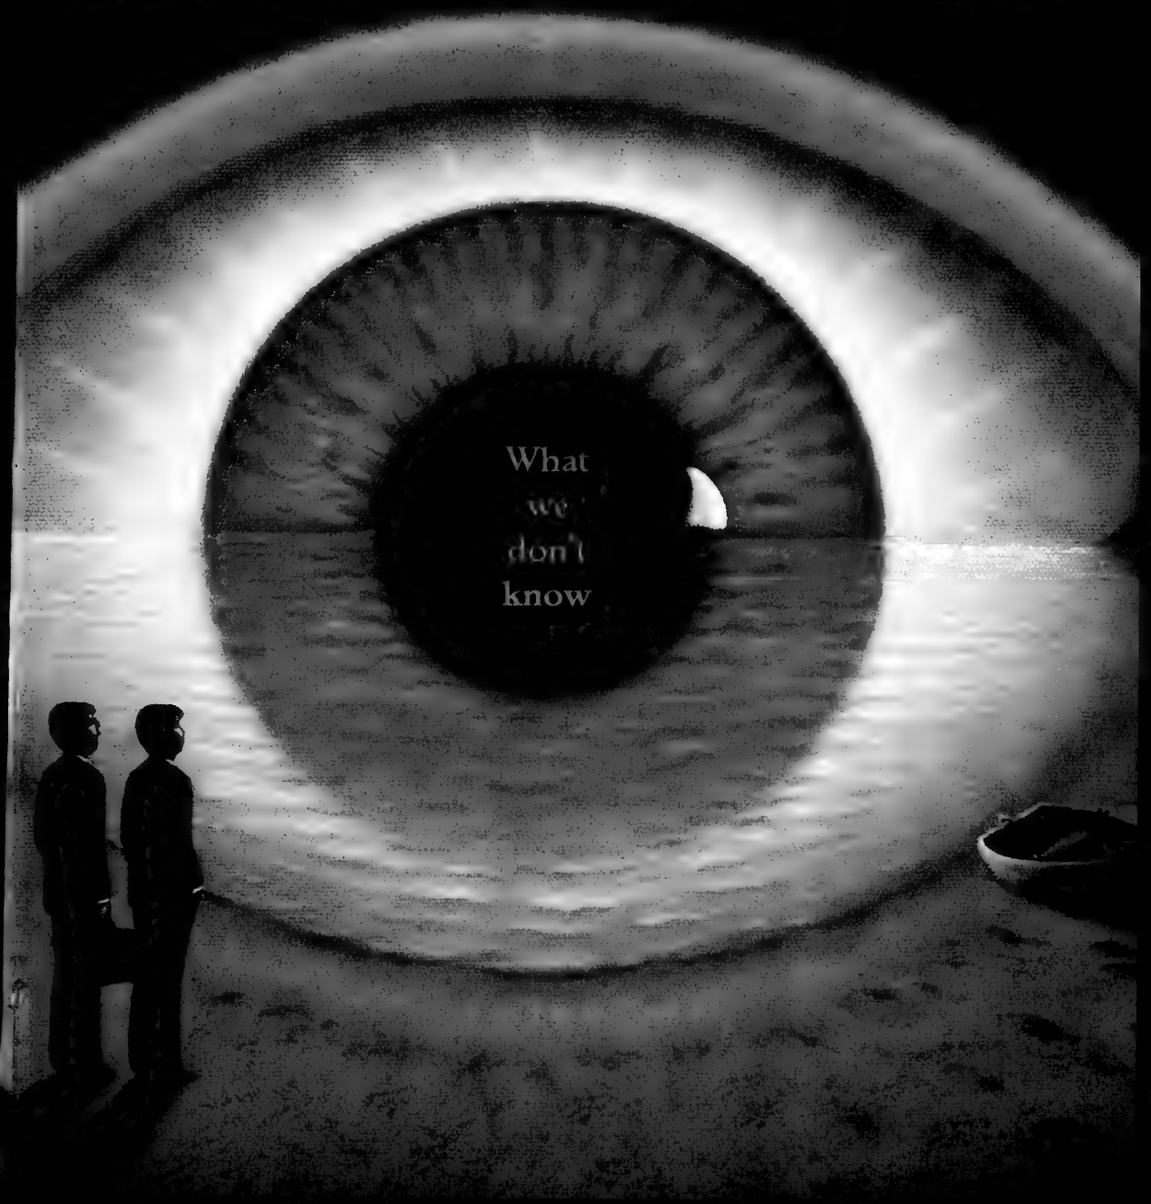
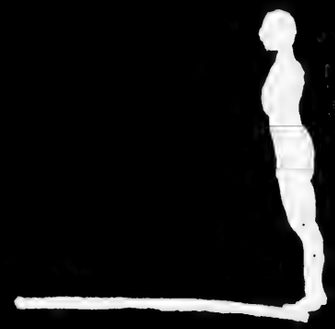
Summer 2002 / 5762

Enjoy the journey





What would you love to know that you don't, or suspect you never will? How is "not knowing" different from ignorance? When does certainty breed smugness? And is it possible to be spiritually nourished by doubt?

For two years now, OLAM has delved into the modern relevance of timeless Judaic ideas, like the Sabbath, protecting the environment and honoring our parents. In this issue, we celebrate perhaps the oldest tradition of them all:

THE ART OF ASKING QUESTIONS

If there's one thing that has kept our tradition alive across the millennia, it must be the fact that we challenge everything, even God, and especially ourselves. We hate closure.

In that spirit, we have assembled a list of soul-searching writers who will explore what keeps them up at night. If after reading this issue you're left with more questions than answers, well, that will be enough closure for us.

Enjoy the journey.

THE EDITOR ASKED US to write about love, thinking we'd know just little enough having been married for three years to be sure we knew nothing. We assured her that indeed, we knew embarrassingly little about love, which was just what she wanted to hear. "Perfect," she said. "You can write about what you don't know." Only in a Jewish magazine could the fact that you know nothing suddenly make you a big expert, so here are just some of the things we don't know about love.

First, Janet and I can't really agree on what love is. Janet BELIEVES it's something you FEEL, I FEEL it's something you BELIEVE. We are still arguing about this as the paper goes to press. Let us know if you figure it out. (You can speak your peace about it, even).

Second (even as Janet and I continue to argue about this last point, which is certainly going to color the rest of this column and isn't that how it always goes – you try to do something nice for the world – the "Olam"– and you end up in a big argument with your wife as Reb Yosi Haglili said, "No good deed goes unpunished... "), okay second – we don't know why we fell in love with each other. Why didn't we fall in love with some other person entirely? Is it fate? Is life a series of accidents? If it is, can you get insured for them? And what would the premiums be?

Third, how much does love weigh? And what color is it? After all, astronomers just now figured out that the universe has a color. They thought it was a light magenta, but now they know the terrible truth – it's actually beige. What about love? Pink, like a valentine? Reddish-purple, like a heart getting ready for transplant? Blue, like the jazz form? Some day they'll find out, and it'll be really important, but so far we are clueless.

Fourth, we don't know why, but it seems that love means never having to say you're sorry only BEFORE the wedding. After the wedding, love seems to mean a constant stream of having to say you're sorry (and by the way, the wedding is not the marriage, contrary to how some may think. Children dream of growing up and GETTING married. Very few dream of BEING married. One is a party, with a big band and an open bar).

Next to finally, two crucial things that Janet and I don't know are Janet and I. Oh sure, she'd know me to pick me out of a police line-up, which is not to say she WOULD, after all, how was I such a genius as to end up in a police line-up? My point is that even in the most intimate relationship, two people never ever KNOW what it is to be in each other's center, to experience the world exactly as the other does. Often, Janet and I will say to each other, "I wish you could see you the way I see you." We don't know what that really means, but it has scored points for both of us.

We do suspect, however, that it is in this precise kernel of ignorance (okay, call it "mystery" if you insist) that the rash of love keeps its itchiness.

And finally, Janet and I agree on one thing we do know. If you want to be happy, find a person who deserves to be happy and make them happy, then claim her two Scottish Terriers as your own, and make them happy. Then, magically, somehow, for some unknown reason, you will be happy too.

If everybody does that, we'll have saved the Olam, with what we don't know about love.

Bill Grundfest has three Emmy nominations as a writer-producer. His muse and wife, Janet, is a recovering attorney.

The Midrash teaches: "The commandments were only given in order to unite all creatures."

"THAT RELIGIOUS CONSCIOUSNESS IN MAN'S experience which is most preferred and most elevated, which penetrates to the very depths and the very heights, is not that simple and comfortable. On the contrary, it's exceptionally complex, rigorous and tortuous. Where you find its complexity, there you find its greatness. The consciousness of homo religioso is in a condition of spiritual crisis, of psychic ascent and descent, of contradiction arising from affirmation and negation, self-appreciation and self-abnegation. Religion is not a refuge of grace and mercy for the despondent and desperate, an enchanted stream for crushed spirits, but a raging, clamorous torrent of men's consciousness with all its crises, pangs and torments."

Such are the anguished reflections of my rebbe, Rabbi Yoseph Dov Soloveitchik, z"l, in his groundbreaking essay, "Halakhic Man."

Rav Soloveitchik, of course, represents the demanding intellectual tradition of the Gaon of Vilna, and one would expect that his religious philosophy would promote a life of tension and struggle. However, similar sentiments also emanate from the Hasidic world of ecstasy and devotion, as expressed by Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel in the opening paragraphs of his classic God in Search of Man. He writes, "It is customary to blame secular science and anti-religious philosophy for the eclipse of religion in modern society. It would be more honest to blame religion for its own defeats. Religion declined not because it was refuted but because it became irrelevant, dull, oppressive and insipid. When faith is completely replaced by creed, worship by discipline, love by habit; when the crisis of today is ignored because of the splendor of the past; when faith becomes an heirloom rather than a living fountain; when religion speaks only in the name of authority rather than with the voice of compassion, its message becomes meaningless....

"The primary task of philosophy of religion is to rediscover the questions to which religion is an answer. In our quest for forgotten questions, the method and spirit of philosophical inquiry are of greater importance than theology. Theology starts with dogma, philosophy begins with problems. Philosophy sees the problem first, theology has the answer in advance."

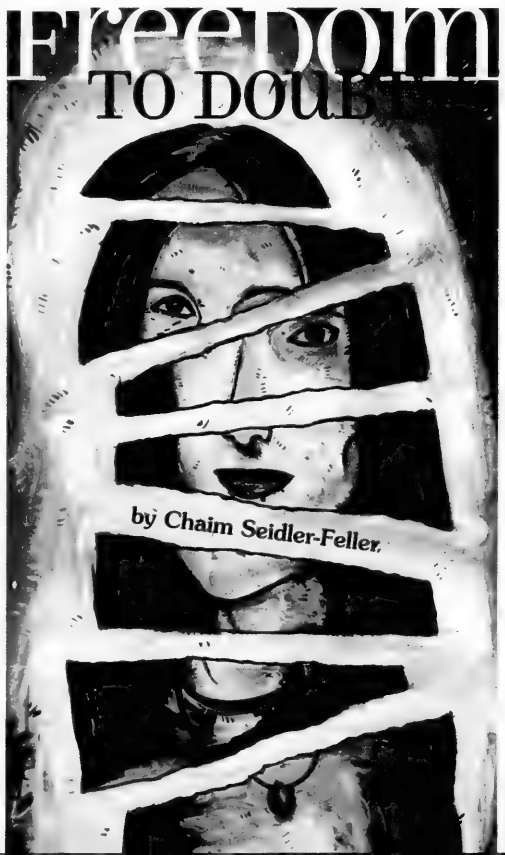
Indeed, that is the precise assumption of the author of the Passover Haggadah, who has made questioning the central focus of the Seder meal of liberation. The message is that free people must learn to live with problems, with doubt, with controversy and with uncertainty. In one of the most insightful comments on the provocative nature of the seder's wicked child, Rabbi Shlomo of Radomsk suggests (Tiferet Shlomo) that the word avoda in the phrase "Whatever does this avoda mean to you?" (Exodus 12:26) refers to the inner struggles of daily existence. The intent of the rasha (wicked child) is to ask "Why do I experience this war (of good and evil) day and night, with no repose and no calm, why must I constantly make decisions?" Says R'Shlomo, "You should explain to that child: understand well that all of this is intended to benefit each human being in the world... If not for the evil inclination one would have nothing remaining to do in this life; one would have no vitality at all and would be compelled to depart this world and venture into his resting place in the next world. Indeed, this was the essential purpose of creation: to struggle with one's impulses all the days of one's life and not heed the call of one's seducer who attempts to trap you in its nest. This is the significance of the Exodus from Egypt: the struggle with one's inclinations."

"Heschel writes:

It is customary to blame secular science and anti-religious philosophy for the eclipse of religion in modern society. It would be more honest to blame religion for its own defeats. Religion declined not because it was refuted, but because it became irrelevant, dull, oppressive and insipid."

In Egypt, there were no choices, no independent thinking, and no room to doubt authority. For the slave, every aspect of life was determined. The individual as a bundle of instincts and desires did not exist. In that context, the gift of freedom was the gift that legitimized doubt and questioning. It granted us the ability to appreciate the fact that initiative and creativity, which were totally absent in slavery, were the product of a life of struggle and of confrontation with innovative ideas and challenging problems. It paved the way for the development of the Jewish culture of controversy that produced Talmudic Judaism. And it allowed us to grasp the fact that uncertainty defined the human condition.

The Seder, with its freewheeling discussion and question-and-answer format, is the means by which the rabbis attempt to educate the people to the reality of freedom and its consequences. It is the quintessential celebration of a life of struggle. Argument and debate are the medium of communication as the table becomes an open beit midrash (study hall). Only the wicked child would ridicule the proceedings and demand certainty. Only the rasha would reject the excitement and innovative spirit generated by an openness to alternative explanations, by the indeterminacy of halakhic discourse, and by never knowing with certainty.



Pharaoh is the one who claims to know "God's name", viewing himself as a god; and he enslaved. Moshe, who to the contrary, searched for God's name and was devoted to a life of quest for truth, was the liberator. Indeed, Pesach itself is the memorialization of the search – commencing with the search for chametz and concluding with the search for the afikoman. The bold response to the wicked child is that the freedom to struggle and to embrace the divinity of uncertainty is the key to our survival.

Kirk Douglas on re-learning how to speak

MY FRUSTRATION AT trying to communicate by speech is always there. Since my stroke I have developed an appreciation for language, an avenue of communication that is the richest and most nuanced (not to mention appropriate) means to express our inner thoughts and feelings. But the more I concentrate on our English language, the more I wonder: How do people without strokes ever learn to speak it? The spelling is so crazy!

So many words spelled the same way can have different meanings and different sounds. Look at these sentences:

The bandage was wound around the wound.

The farm was used to produce produce.

When shot at, the dove dove into the bushes.

The wind was too strong to wind the sail.

The buck does funny things when the does are present.

How can I intimate this to my most intimate friend?

I think this was done to be mean to stroke victims.

Then, as every third grader knows, there are the words that sound the same when spoken, but are spelled differently when written:

He threw the ball through the window, too, and when it broke in two, he felt terrible when he saw the damage he had done to the brand-new car ... who knew he could throw a ball so well?!

As you regain your speech, the spelling can confuse you.

I always have trouble with my "S". One night some friends took me to an Italian restaurant (I love pasta). In ordering my dinner, I couldn't say "spaghetti." All I could say was "paghetti." We all laughed.

That week, I concentrated on S. This is how you say it: "Spread your lips, teeth almost touching, tongue flat against your bottom teeth and make the S sound. Remember to place your tongue lightly on the front teeth and allow the air to exit over the tip. Do not allow the tongue to rest between your teeth for any of the sibilant sounds. Practice for 10 minutes, twice a day. Say the words with care. Allow time for your lips and tongue to get around."

Did you get all that?

Now try it. Of course, with practice, it becomes automatic.

Not long after, I was in the same restaurant and there were my friends at a corner table. I walked over to them, leaned down, and said, "Spaghetti, spaghetti, spaghetti." And then, haughtily, walked away, my heart filled with the S of smiles.

I had more trouble with the word "is" than President Clinton, until I realized that "is" is "iz." I couldn't say Mexico until I realized it was Mek-siko. One exercise helped, but drove me crazy: "A sick sparrow sang six sad spring songs sitting sighing under a simmering sun." I don't know if I could have handled that even before my stroke!

Constantly, I had to remind myself, "Don't lose your sense of humor." My son Michael was very sympathetic. We had been planning to do a movie together.

"'Dad, don't worry. We'll do the movie, just keep working with your speech therapist,'" he said.

"Michael, why don't you work with my speech therapist?"

He looked at me.

"And when you talk like I talk, we'll do the movie," I challenged.

We both roared.

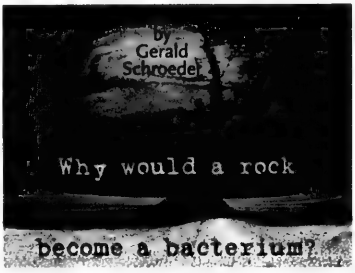
FOLLOWING EVENING prayers at the Kotel (the Western Wall), a friend wondered aloud why he could feel the warmth of the Kotel stones even from a distance. As I explained the nuances of how radiant energy is absorbed and later re-emitted, I hoped that his spiritual moment wasn't diminished by all that science. For me the "hows" behind the phenomena of the universe add to my own appreciation of the creation.

Unfortunately, not all questions have such accessible answers as those related to radiant energy. There's a category of puzzles relating to the inherent nature of nature – such as why is there a universe? – that cry out for philosophical as well as scientific scrutiny. For me, those are the really intriguing areas of science.

So while I'm at the Kotel I'm not wondering about heat from the stones, or how ancient King Herod managed to stack those massive rocks so neatly. I want to know why we have stones in the first place, and – looking at the plants growing between the stones, the doves that perch in the crevices and the human beings rocking in prayer – how stones gave birth to life.



All scientific data imply that the universe first appeared as a mass of extraordinarily condensed, exquisitely hot energy – in essence, super-powerful light rays. That energy then metamorphosed into matter, and the matter somehow became alive. Yet when I try to figure out how seemingly inert matter acquired the intricately ordered symphony found in every form of life, I get stuck. The standard model of evolution, taught as dogma, is that random mutations and natural selection were the driving forces behind life's climb to ever greater complexity. The more it evolved, according to this theory, the better each organism could survive.

But let's take a step back to a time before life – when all the earth offered was rocks, some simple molecules and water. What advantage for survival or aspect of natural selection would drive a rock to become a bacterium? All forms of life are less stable, less durable, than a rock. And yet life was parented by these seemingly inert substrates.

To explain life's genesis, Nobel laureate and organic chemist Christian de Duve envisions some undefined auto-catalytic processes forced upon matter by some undefined natural properties inherent in matter.

As a scientist, I too struggle to see all events as having natural (i.e., scientifically explainable) causes. The problem with a natural version for life's origins is the awesome rapidity with which life appeared on the earth. Most people are unaware of the fact that no sooner had the once molten earth cooled than life flourished. Yet even the simplest bacteria contain an encyclopedia of information and operating instructions. From where did all this information arise, and in a geological flash?

We scientists always defer to "the laws of nature" as if those laws were out there in some abstract way, pushing the pieces of nature around. Recent discoveries reveal that those so-called laws of nature appear as an inherent wisdom, a form of information present in every particle and every ray of light. Physicist Freeman Dyson of Princeton's Institute for Advanced Study put it this way: "Atoms are weird stuff, behaving as active agents rather than inert substances.... It appears that a mind is to some extent present in every atom." In Torah talk, we say "I am Wisdom.... God made me [Wisdom] first of all His works." (Proverbs 8:12, 22)

Life could arise from matter and matter from energy because every aspect of existence carries within it the imprint of a Divine wisdom that is creation. As de Duve wrote: "Faced with the enormous sum of lucky draws behind the success [of life]... one may legitimately wonder to what extent this success is actually written into the fabric of the universe."

But even as I accept that Wisdom is couched in all existence, my powers of imagination are too limited to conjure up how the scent of wild thyme on a Jerusalem hillside, the chatter of the doves, the wiggling toes of a baby under his father's prayer shawl, and life itself, were all written into the creation at that moment just before the Big Bang, when all that existed was the wisdom of the Divine.

WONDERING ABOUT THE REAL NATURE of gravity leads eventually to wondering whether there are more than the four dimensions we can easily observe. To get to that place, we might first wonder if nature is, in fact, schizophrenic: Should we accept that there are two kinds of forces that operate over two different scales – gravity for big scales like galaxies, the other three forces for the tiny world of atoms? Poppycock, say unified theory proponents – there must be a way to connect the three atomic-scale forces with gravity. Maybe, but it won't be easy.

In the first place, gravity is odd. Einstein's general theory of relativity says gravity isn't so much a force as it is an inherent property of space and time. Accordingly, Earth orbits the Sun not because it is attracted by gravity but because it has been caught in a big dimple in space-time caused by the Sun and spins around inside this dimple like a fast-moving marble caught in a large bowl. Second, gravity, as far as we have been able to detect, is a continuous phenomenon, whereas all the other forces of nature come in discrete packets.

All this leads us to the string theorists and their explanation for gravity, which includes other dimensions. The original string-theory model of the universe combines gravity with the other three forces in a complex 11-dimensional world. In that world – our world – seven of the dimensions are wrapped up on themselves in unimaginably small regions that escape our notice. One way to get your mind around these extra dimensions is to visualize a single strand of spiderweb. To the naked eye, the filament appears to be one dimensional, but at high magnification it resolves into an object with considerable width, breadth and depth. String theorists argue that we can't see extra dimensions because we lack instruments powerful enough to resolve them.

We may never see these extra dimensions directly, but we may some day be able to detect evidence of their existence with the instruments of astronomers and particle physicists.

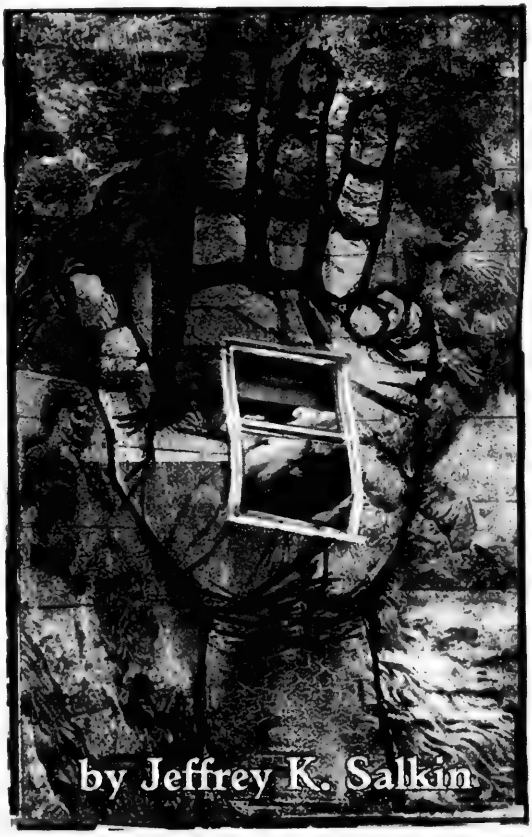
"Rabbi, it's about my windows" Because I am a rabbi, people ask me all sorts of religious and not-so-religious questions. "Rabbi, is my six-year-old child too young to take to his great-grandmother's funeral?"

"Rabbi, do you know a way to make pizza that would be acceptable to eat on Passover?" "Rabbi, can my son's bar mitzvah ceremony be on a Saturday evening so that our guests don't have to wait around all day until the party?"

Those are all good questions. But nothing – no amount of seminary or post-seminary education, no amount of collegial conversations or extra-curricular reading – could have prepared me for the question that a congregant asked me in the wake of the September 11 disaster.



"Rabbi, I live on the Upper West Side of Manhattan," she said. "My windows are covered with the grime that has drifted uptown since ... you know. I need to clean my windows, but I've got to believe that there are ashes of the dead in that dust. It doesn't seem right to just have the windows cleaned. What do I do?"

What does this wondering Jew already know, even as the words of the question leave her mouth?

She knows that Judaism views the human body with reverence. She has seen the horrific scenes of ultra-Orthodox Jews in Israel gathering the mangled scraps of bodies that terrorist bombs have torn apart – and they pursue this seemingly morbid quest because people are made in God's image, and everything of us is precious. My wondering Jew knows that the sanctity of the body lingers after death, way after the body has been reduced to its elements. Judaism frowns on cremation, and yet the ashes of the dead are routinely buried in Jewish cemeteries.

She knows something else. Yes, the American rabbi, version 2001, is often a master of ceremonies and an administrator. And yet the traditional role of the rabbi always wins out. That role is as teacher with a life embedded in a wisdom tradition, as someone who hears questions and who uses a millennia-old tradition to find answers.

But my questioner, alas, has grabbed me in the synagogue lobby right after services, and I am on my way to visit someone in the hospital. I don't have the time to repair to my book-laden study, much less to write to a Jewish legal authority and ask the question. Perhaps her answer is buried somewhere in the piles of questions that Jews asked the last time we encountered sacred ashes – questions about how the ashes of Holocaust victims should be buried.

Out of somewhere, my answer came out. "This is what I would do," I said. "Use a paper towel to wipe the windows clean as much as possible. Then put the paper towel in an envelope, take it to a Jewish funeral home, and ask them to bury it the next time they do a funeral." She nodded and thanked me for the advice – and that is precisely what she did.

There's a Hasidic saying: "If you want to find a spark, sift through the ashes." As we continue to sift through the ashes of September 11, there are sacred sparks. That woman's question was a spark. She reminds us that religion matters more than we had ever thought. Religion is about real, get-your-hands-dirty questions and tentative replies.

"No amount of post-seminary education could have prepared me for the question a congregant asked me in the wake of September 11."

Some of my colleagues are silently yelling: "How can you answer a question like that on the fly? You must go to the texts! You have to find what others have said about this kind of issue!"

Guilty as charged. And I still do not know if I gave her the right answer.

But there are times when we consult a different kind of Shulchan Aruch (Code of Jewish Law). It is a multi-volume tome that is found within the sacred library of the soul.

At those times, the answers to the things we do not know emerge of their own accord, from between the letters of words already written on a faded inner parchment, and with more to teach us than the things we think we know.

A Q and Q with Jerry Brown

by Joelle Keene

OLAM: MAYOR BROWN, WHAT QUESTIONS KEEP YOU UP AT NIGHT?

JERRY BROWN (JB): I try not to ever let things keep me up at night.

OLAM: All right then, so what are some things that you just don't know?

JB: Well, there's a lot I don't know. Where's cloning going to end up? I don't know about that. The using of body parts, where does that go – what's progress and what's regression? I don't know. I assume it's going to happen but I can't tell you what the implications are, other than to change some of our basic self-interest. We're getting away from the concept of creation into an autonomously regenerative system, with the human mind being a part of all that.

OLAM: Do you ever wonder if there are issues that are unsolvable?

JB: The great issues as I see them are, first, the rather large gaps in income and wealth, and the system does not seem to have anything on the agenda that will remedy that, and secondly, the destructive impact of industrial activity on global climate and species. This seems to be a serious problem but it is not one that lends itself to political discussion.

Instead, the electorate is getting a very restricted diet of issues like terrorism, abortion, guns, taxes and crime. But political leaders should be working to, one, alleviate suffering, and two, minimize the negative impact on the environmental systems on which human life depends.

OLAM: Maybe we don't know how to protect the environment while still producing enough to alleviate suffering.

JB: Actually the gap between what we know about the environment and what we're doing is huge. The Union of Concerned Scientists has laid out clear warnings that say, in a nutshell, that humanity's on a collision course with nature. All of a sudden the tornadoes and rains and winds will become more devastating, and there's going to be more suffering.

OLAM: Polls show that people do care about the environment. Why would politics lag behind?

JB: Because it's complicated, the science is complicated, and then other people raise questions, say that everything's fine and so on. It's a complex equation, so it allows the immediate desire for money and advantage to triumph over a wise and restrained course of action.

It's like the prophets of the Old Testament, who often were not listened to. The warnings of the Union of Concerned Scientists sound like the Lamentations of Jeremiah!

OLAM: Do you wonder why people don't listen to prophets?

JB: Well, the Catholic explanation is that "sin darkens the intellect and weakens the will." And in fact, the seven basic deadly sins – pride, envy, gluttony, lust, anger, greed and sloth – are not viewed as evils today in the way they were in the past. Now we have a reversal, temporary though it may be. Take pride – we call pride self-confidence and self-esteem and we promote it. But if you're always worrying about your appearance, puffing yourself up, thinking you're the best – well, let's just say there's not a lot of preaching of humility today. Envy – the desire to keep up with the Joneses, get a bigger house and a fancier car, well that's built into the system now.

OLAM: Maybe what we don't know is how to conquer our human impulses.

JB: Well, we have the seven heavenly virtues – humility, kindness, abstinence, chastity, patience, generosity and diligence. That's a heavy spiritual challenge. And I don't think that quite fits in our secular culture, or into television revenues either. You've got a system that is being validated by its incredible productivity, which is impressive with a world of so many poor people. But it doesn't tend to build the virtues.

OLAM: Is it possible for a tolerant, democratic society to build spiritual virtues?

JB: This is one of the great issues of capitalism. Boundaries have to come from outside the system, but there IS no system outside the economy. We even know from Clinton that the key to our condition is "the economy, stupid" – if you don't see the economy as the all-enveloping frame of reference, you're stupid. Any other view would be marginalized or stigmatized as "private" or "your point of view." But the economy is not a point of view; it is the reality, the air we breathe, the being of modernity, and those who would offer some restraint, based on Judaism or Christianity or Hinduism or Islam or Buddhism or Zoroastrianism, just have a particular point of view. And that is to be tolerated, whereas the economy isn't tolerated – the economy is the ground on which we show up.

OLAM: How can we know what to do as individuals?

JB: We are in a certain conversation, and you have to be in that conversation. Pick up the newspaper and see what the conversation is. That's why some people withdraw, become Orthodox or fundamentalists; then they have a world view that's more consistent with traditional wisdom. But such views don't have the authority of the marketplace.

The challenge is to derive values other than economic values from an economic world view. And it is difficult if not impossible. The human mind is pushing back all manner of frontiers. But the full consequences of progress are not clear.

OLAM: Does THAT keep you up at night?

JB: Well, I don't like to lie awake at night. And the culture has a lot of resources: good principles, good examples in history, great thoughts by presidents and leaders, as Abraham Lincoln said, "the angels of our better nature." There is that positive that we have to generate, and I know we can. That's why I sleep okay.

Jerry Brown was governor of California from 1974 to 1982, and is currently the mayor of Oakland.

How many Bob Dylans?

How many musicians were there?

How many Albert Einsteins, one, two, three?

How about the writers,
how many Yehoshuas, Singers,
Roths?

How many Saul Bellows?
Any Mailers or Richlers?

The thinkers, how many Heschels?
How many Berlins?

The contrarians, the dissenters,
the revolutionaries: Did you see any Spinozas, Marxes, Kafkas?

And oh yes, the doctors:
Any Sigmunds or Rambams?
And can you tell us what diseases they would have cured?

Did you come across any famous rabbis, any Soloveitchiks,
Schneersons, Carlebachs, Kaplans?
How many Ben Gurions did you see?

And what about the women:
Who did you meet? Any Golda Meirs,
Hanna Seneshes, Emma Goldmans,
Lazaruses, Streisands?

I'm almost done: How many Woody
Allens were there? And Spielberg, of course, how many Spielbergs?
Were there a few Chagals?

And the musicians: Did you hear a few Sterns or Perlmans or Dylans?

I mean, six million is quite a number.

You must have seen something,
dear God.

ignorance

"He is in two places at the same time: the human fate."

AT ONE OF THE CRITICAL moments of his life, Jacob wakes from sleep and recognizes the shape of his own ignorance. At Beth El, the "house of God," he emerges from the dream of a ladder spanning heaven and earth and says: "Indeed, there is God in this place, and I did not know." (Genesis 28:16) What is this not-knowing that Jacob learns for the first time? Why is God-in-this-place such a revelation to him?

"He collided (in Hebrew, vayifga – "he arrived at," but literally "collided") with the place, and he spent the night there, for the sun had set. And he took of the stones of the place and put them at his head. And he lay down in that place." (Genesis 28:11) A powerful midrashic tradition identifies this place – "the place" that Jacob has abrasively, bruisingly encountered (vayifga bamakom) – as Mount Moriah. That is, as the midrash hauntingly expresses it, he took the very stones of that place – of the altar where his father, Isaac, had lain trussed for the sacrifice – and lay down to sleep there. There he dreams of a ladder and of angels climbing between earth and heaven.

But, asks Rashi, he is described as being in "Beth El which is Luz"; how can he be in Mount Moriah? And Rashi answers: "Mount Moriah was plucked up by the roots and came to him here." Before he can rehearse the encounter with his father's place of darkness – a place that he has perhaps been resisting all his life – it is upon him. He is in two places at the same time: the human fate. Space and time shockingly telescope and he is caught in the vortex of that place. "The whole world became a kind of wall (kotel) up against him," explains Bereshit Raba. His access to his world must be through that place. "Indeed there is God in this place, and I did not know...."

The Zohar reads Jacob's ignorance in a startling psychoanalytic mode: "I – anochi – did not know," as "my Self – anochi – I did not know." Jacob wakes to an incipient consciousness of worlds unknown within himself. A new way of feeling his own being dawns with this sense of darkness. Implicitly, a new question enters the biblical discourse: Who am I? Behind this question, we hear his mother's similar but different question, as he struggled in her womb with his twin brother: "If so," asks Rachel in Genesis 25:22, "why am I?" The anochi, Jacob's selfhood, is shrouded in a troubled darkness known for the first time and associated with a new awareness of God. This is the beginning of a painful unfolding of the complexities and implications of that selfhood.

For this is the man, our father Jacob, who had responded to his father's searching question: "Who are you, my son?" with the answer: "I – anochi – am Esau, your firstborn." (Genesis 27: 18-19) Meeting for the first time in unrehearsed words his own fragmented being, he had reached out beyond the primary identity of the "simple man dwelling in tents" to a twin complexity, to a mask of otherness that revealed the strangeness, unknowable, uncanny, familiar, within him. "Every profound spirit needs a mask," said Nietzsche. Grotesquely costumed in goatskins, he masqueraded as Esau, who, according to a classic midrashic tradition, masqueraded as Jacob. The games by which identity is constructed are played out within a mirroring world of twinhood and doublings.

Waking at Beth El, Jacob takes full account, for the first time, of the enigmatic nature of identity – of what it means to have a self. "Who am I?" – the question, as Christopher Bollas points out in Cracking Up, that loves to be asked, in spite of – because of – the fact that it is unanswerable. Jacob experiences the generative darkness in which he knows the baffling doubleness of his own identity. He is both Jacob and Esau masquerading as one another. He is the ladder on which angels glorify and castigate him, yielding a fissured sense of Jacob-above and Jacob-below.

He is husband to both Rachel and Leah. Rachel is the wife desired, chosen perhaps not only for her beauty, to be seen and known, but for her capacity to know him, in his conscious, autonomous identity; Leah is the wife who "happens to him," like the place that precipitately comes upon him, the place that he would not have chosen. It is the latter marriage that mirrors his own fissured self back to him and that forces his notions of self to expand uncomfortably. On the morning after the wedding night, as Leah drops the Rachel mask behind which she has played out her own desire, the midrash has him protest: "But all night I called you Rachel – and you responded!" She answers: "There is no teacher without students!" and compels him to recognize the unwitting, unwilled complexity of his own being. Known by the "wrong person," by another masked seeker of self, Jacob experiences the intimate disturbance that will generate a new depth of selfhood.

T.S.Eliot writes in "East Coker": "In order to arrive at what you do not know/You must go by a way which is the way of ignorance/In order to possess what you do not possess/You must go by the way of dispossession."

The way of dispossession begins to inform Jacob's consciousness at the moment when he wakes to experience God's presence in a place in which the vital illusions of mastery, of knowledge, of apparent reality, are burned away. There begins a process of encounters with multiple places and persons through whom he reclaims lost parts of himself. Ultimately, it is the encounter with the uncanny, the "not-known," within himself that unfolds into a life with God. "Indeed, there is God in this place, and I did not know."

ARGUING WITH G-D IS AN old Jewish tradition. Abraham did it, Moses did it, most Jewish grandmothers do it frequently. But according to our sages, the first to argue with G-d was the moon. And God didn't mind. He was looking for an interactive experience when He created the cosmos, and a lot of that comes from losing arguments with your creations – in fact, losing most of them. The rabbis of the Talmud recount that when G-d lost an argument with them once, He laughed and said, "They beat me! My children beat me!" So He actually gets a kick out of the whole thing.*

Arguing with the moon – and losing – was part of the original plan. G-d set her up for it. The Babylonian Talmud (Chulin 60b) tells the story cryptically. Here, for the first time, is the actual dialogue:

It was early on that first Wednesday morning that the sun and the moon woke up to find themselves initialized into existence, high up in the sky, both illuminating Planet Earth with equal intensity. Right off, the moon complained.

"So we've got two bosses in the same office! Bad idea."

Now G-d is a reasonable employer, open to constructive criticism. He considered the comments of his newborn critic and replied, "Good point. Therefore, kindly make yourself smaller."

Creation being a voice-activated interface, the moon was instantly diminished in size. That's when the real argument began.

"What a crummy system!" the moon exclaimed. "You lay things out the way they are, and you get shrunk for it!"

Once again, G-d was impressed by the biting insight of His creation. It seemed that He really liked the moon and felt for her case.

"Please allow me to make up for this," He said.

"Like how?" she demanded.

"How's this," G-d replied. "The sun only gets to shine for her set 12 hours. But you may shine at night and sometimes for a little of the day."

"Well with the luminence rating you've given me, I might as well be some puny candle in the big blue sky!" the moon replied.

"Speaking of the sky," the dark sky began to glitter as G-d spoke, "I've filled the night sky with pretty stars to keep you company!"

"Well I like the jewelry," said the moon, "but I still don't like being small."

"What's so terrible about being small?" asked God. "The truly great people of history will be small! Jacob will be smaller than his brother, Esau. David will be smaller than his seven brothers. There will even be a great sage who they will call 'Samuel the Small'!"

"Great!" she countered. "And I'll be 'the small, insignificant moon'. No one will even notice me."

"That's not true!" G-d cried. "You will serve a very major function in their lives. You see, although most peoples will fix their calendars according to the position of the sun, I will tell the Jewish people to count their days according to the appearance of the moon."

"But they'll end up making adjustments based on the sun so that their holidays stay in the right season," she said. "Even when I get my own domain, it's tailored to suit that other light. Can't you just make me big again?"

"And what then?" G-d pleaded. "I can't make everybody the same size. You said that yourself. There has to be protocol, or else it just doesn't work."

"So this was already planned!" the moon exclaimed. "Now you want me to be shrunken as if it were all my fault!"

"No. It's my fault." G-d spoke pensively. "I wanted a world. And a world is a place where there is higher and lower, greater and smaller, parent and child. A heirarchy. Where things begin in one place and move on to somewhere else."

"So for you, my pain doesn't even exist."

"Of course it exists! Otherwise, why should I have built in all this compensation?" G-d paused. "Here, let me show you what the future has in store."

The cosmos quickly arranged themselves to the year 2448 after creation. The moon rose over ancient Egypt, no more than a sliver in the sky.

"What do you see?" G-d asked her.

"Pyramids."

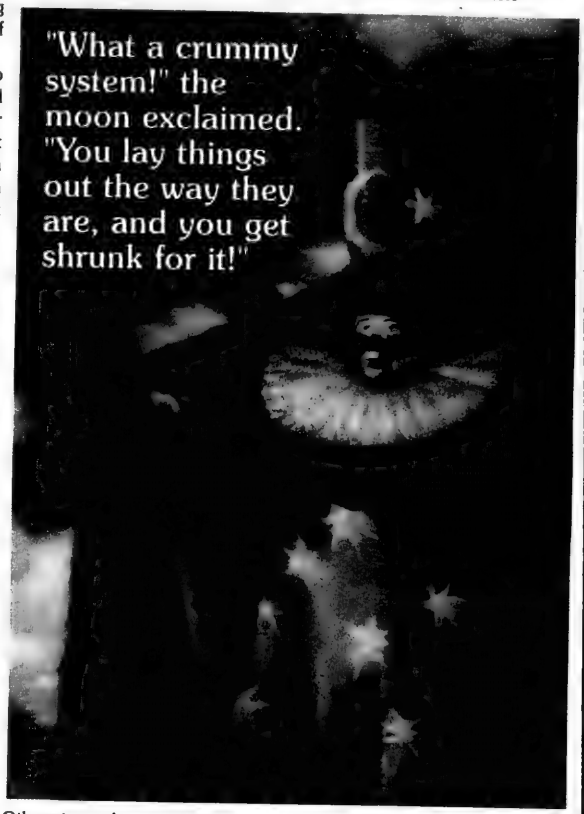
"Yes, this is the land of pyramids. All knowledge, all power, all wealth in a neat pyramid of higher to lower. No one dares question the absolute power of Pharaoh. No one – until my man in Egypt. And now I shall speak with him: Moses!" "Yes Sir."

"You have done a fine job. As your ancestor, Abraham, smashed the idols of his father's house, you have flattened the pyramid of Egyptian authoritarianism. You have championed the plight of the oppressed and brought freedom and liberation into my world."

"Thanks, oh Infinite One. What's next?"

"Now I want to introduce you to your mascot. She is the symbol of all that you and your people must accomplish. She is the moon and she is small, and she is humble and oppressed. You will begin now to redeem her, to uplift her status, by counting your calendar according to her cycles.

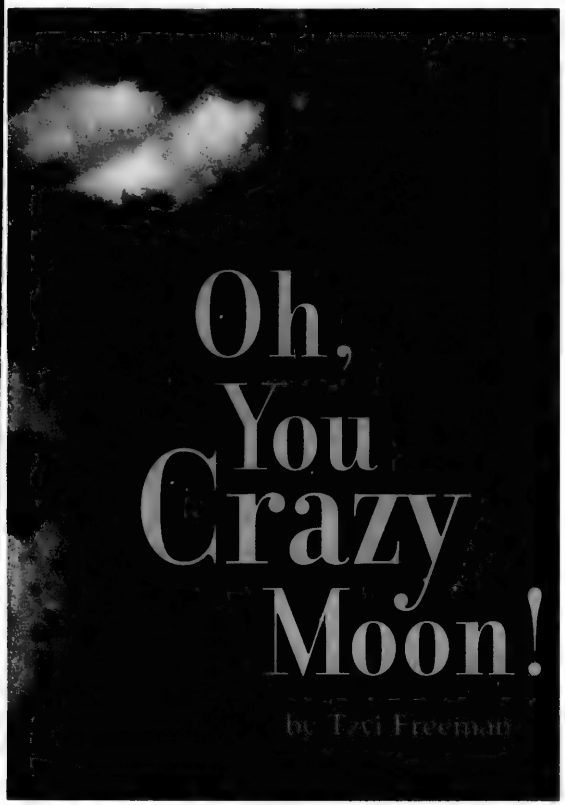
"And this shall be a constant reminder for you and your people of your mission in this world. For in this world you shall not be the most powerful, nor the most numerous. You shall be the smallest of the nations. At times you shall dwindle and almost disappear – as she disappears from the sky at the end of each month. But only to return again, as an imperishable light, once again to champion the cause of the downtrodden and enslaved."



A thousand scenes passed by. Scenes of valiant giving, heroic rescue, boundless compassion, of sharing and kindness. The oppressed were rescued from their plight. The downtrodden were returned their self-esteem. Those suffering pain and misfortune were comforted and healed. A deep joy filled the hearts of those who helped.

"Does that always happen?" asked the moon.

"Always," affirmed G-d. "There are no one-way streets in my world. The poor give to the rich, students to their teachers, children to parents, the small to the great."



"But they are still small!" said the moon. "Not only am I small, but just when I become full and at least visible, then right away I have to start diminishing myself back to zero, night by night."

"Just like the great personalities of history I mentioned to you before," God said. "They, too, become great by becoming nothing. Look at Moses – what did he say? 'Find someone else – I'm not good enough.' Same with King David. At the height of his glory, he will sit in his palace late at night and sing songs to me about what a worthless worm he is.

"And then there's Harriet Goldberg...."

"Who's Harriet Goldberg?"

"She will be a waitress in a greasy-spoon cafeteria where she'll excel at keeping her good deeds quiet. Like you and all the other true greats, as soon as she begins to shine, she'll remind herself of her nothingness and try to disappear. Which will only increase the power of her deeds."

"I bet she'll lead a miserable life."

"She won't think so."

"I bet there's a lot of suffering down in that world of yours."

"Well...."

"Suffering, pain, darkness. If it were up to me, the entire world would be filled with happiness and joy and light!"

"Why is light any greater than darkness?" God asked.

"When there's light, you know the truth," the moon replied. "And you don't suffer the pain of meaninglessness and confusion."

"When there is light you have a ray of the truth," God replied. "In the dark you can touch the essence."

This was going to need some explaining; perhaps a science project.

"Let me illustrate what happens when you diminish to complete invisibility from earth," G-d said. We'll start in full moon mode. Okay, where are you now in relation to the sun?"

"Well, there's the sun, a few planets, then earth," said the moon. "Then, a little further and there's little me. The sun shines onto me, and some of that light bounces down to earth."

"Exactly. Now, let's see where you are when your light disappears from the earth. There. How do you relate to the sun now?"

"Well, the earth isn't between us anymore."

"So are you further away or closer to the light?"

"Closer."

"And so it is with all those who travel through darkness in their lives," said God. "In those places they are closer to the truth than at any other time. And because of those dark moments they can shine toward others."

"Why couldn't You make it so that humanity could reach Your essence without the suffering?" the moon insisted.

"That," He said, "I will not say."

Silence.

Then G-d looked down again to Moses. "Moses!" he called.

"Yes, sir!"

"I have another good deed for you. It has to do with the new moon. When it comes to the beginning of each month, I want you to bring a sin offering for Me."

"A sin offering for Who?" Moses asked.

"For Me. Because I have diminished the light of the moon. And because there is suffering and oppression in My world. And darkness."

"But G-d," Moses asked. "Why don't You just do away with the suffering?"

"That's your job, Moses."

"So why did You put it here in the first place? Who forced Your Almighty Hand?"

"You, too?" G-d paused.

Moses waited.

Finally, G-d said, "Moses, you know I have revealed to you every secret of the cosmos. I have not held back a thing, but have given you My entire Torah, My most essential wisdom, to share and to teach to your people."

Moses stood still.

"But there is one thing that, as long as you live in this world, I cannot reveal to you, one thing for which I must only say, 'Silence! So it must be!'"

"But why, Eternal G-d?" Moses pleaded.

"Moses," G-d asked, "if you knew the answer, if you understood why there had to be suffering from an all-powerful, beneficent G-d, what would you do then?"

"I suppose I wouldn't feel so bad about it then."

"Precisely. And that is just what I don't want. I don't want you to tolerate darkness. You must fight it with every sinew of your flesh, with all the capacity of your soul. Until you redeem every spark of light from its captivity, until you can bring sweetness to the most bitter places, until you have not left a corner of my world untouched with acts of kindness and compassion – until then you must hate the darkness as a blood-sworn enemy.

"So until that time, when I will wipe the tears of sorrow from every face, when all darkness, even the darkness of the past, will become light as the light of the first day of Creation – when, as Isaiah will say, the light of the moon will be as great as the light of the sun....

"Until then, atone for Me."

desperately seeking the CENTER

I'M NOT ALWAYS SURE WHERE I belong.

Two worlds exist in Judaism that seem difficult to reconcile. Nothing is more inspiring than being in the presence of a true tzaddik (righteous person), someone whose whole essence reflects his pure faith in God and the Torah. There is no need for the tzaddik to reconcile scientific or philosophical contradictions that crop up in Judaism. His belief in Torah is enough to carry him beyond the questions and arrive at the ultimate, singular truth. But other times I feel a mixture of jealousy and incredulity at a tzaddik's ability to keep running on pure faith. What about all the questions? Why shouldn't we take scientific challenges to Judaism seriously? In the presence of the tzaddik I feel less than an "empty vessel," filled with stinging questions.

When I'm in an academic setting, I sometimes admire the exactitude of biblical scholars who can isolate unique textual nuances and see as well the historical backdrop and mores of the author's times. Occasionally I will marvel at the scientific method employed to arrive at their conclusions. These scholars seem able to bridge the gap between modern philosophy and historiography on the one hand and Judaism and all of its Divinity and mysticism on the other. But more often I am filled with resentment toward these scholars who, in their attempt to arrive at the ultimate, singular truth, make a mockery of my holy Torah by dismissing those parts they deem provincial or arcane.

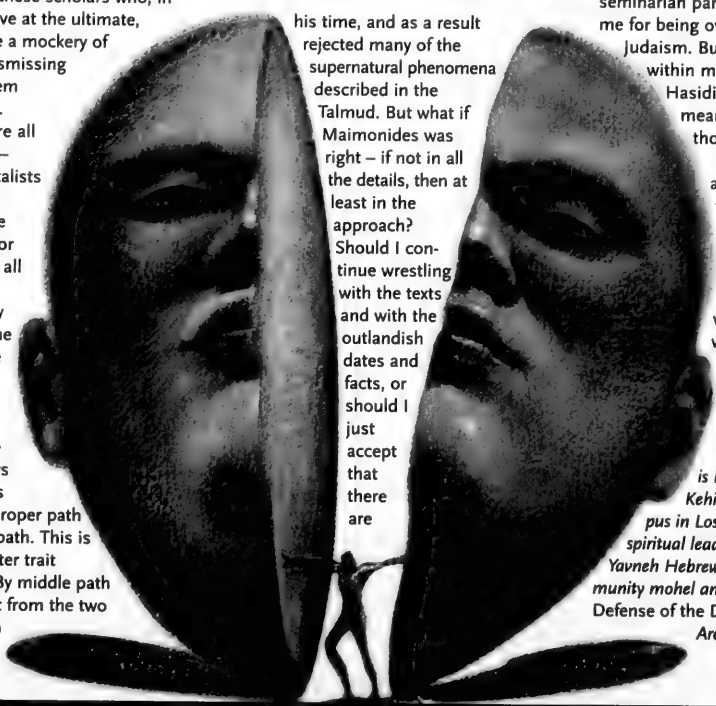
Some people are all heart and no brain – religious fundamentalists who will not even attempt to reconcile Judaism with logic or science. Others are all brain and no heart, rejecting completely any religious doctrine that flies in the face of contemporary wisdom.

Of course, as one would think, the middle road is always the best, and so says Maimonides. "The proper path in life is the middle path. This is true for every character trait possessed by man. By middle path we mean equidistant from the two extremes." (Hilchoth De'oth 1:3) Sometimes it's necessary to use one's intellect to challenge the text, he says elsewhere; don't reject it, but work on understanding it until you can make it both intellectually satisfying and religiously believed. Not all heart, and not all brain, but rather in some place where the two come together in harmonious synthesis.

How do you know if you've reached that golden mean? Anyone can paint himself as a "centrist," because we can always find people to the right or the left of us on any issue. But how do I know that I haven't simply painted the center line to conform to where I am standing, instead of moving over to where the real center lies? Maybe I am meant to reject all the scientific methodology and philosophy of the secular community, as many Torah giants of previous generations advocated. Maimonides himself, they argued, was tainted by the Aristotelian influences of his time, and as a result rejected many of the supernatural phenomena described in the Talmud. But what if Maimonides was right – if not in all the details, then at least in the approach? Should I continue wrestling with the texts and with the outlandish dates and facts, or should I just accept that there are certain things that will have to wait to be answered by Elijah the Prophet, at the advent of the time of Redemption?

Once, when attending a theological conference at a university, I couldn't help feeling sorry for the academics who seemed quite smug about their knowledge of the "truth." These poor souls, I thought, could never really feel the beauty of a Shabbat table or of dancing with the Torah. Alas, their expanded intellects, filled with facts about the Dead Sea Scrolls and the "P" and "J" authors of Isaiah, so dominated their lives as to preclude their hearts' having any sway. My mind conjured up a caricature of a boy with a head as large as a watermelon, but with a disproportionately puny body. A sad being such as this can only sit at the windowsill, I thought, watching the other children at play but unable to join them, or to feel the rush of air they feel when running through a field. How awful, I thought, to be that boy.

"These scholars seem able to bridge the gap between modern philosophy and historiography on the one hand and Judaism and all of its Divinity and mysticism on the other."



And yet I knew there is the other extreme – those so literal in their reading of the Torah that the word apikores (heretic) is at the tip of their tongue, ready to be lobbed at anyone who would have the audacity to suggest that one of the great rabbis of the past had read Kant and Descartes. Not a pretty picture either.

The Litvak within me – the scholarly seminarian part of me – sometimes scolds me for being overly emotional about my Judaism. But then the dancing Hasid within me reminds me that often Hasidim have more fun and meaning in their lives than those stoic Litvaks.

There's room at the table – and even at my inner table – for the academics and the Hasidim. Sitting them down together for the same meal, however, is a difficult task. I look forward to the time when all the protagonists within me will live in harmony. If and when that happens, I hope OLAM will invite me to write again.

What are we?
What is our life?
What is our goodness?
What is our righteousness?
What is our help?
What is our strength?
What is our might?

– Prayers from the Daily Morning Service

EACH MORNING, HALF awake, and usually resentful, I painfully mutter these questions at the beginning of the morning prayer service, Shacharit, as prescribed by my tradition.

It has only been a few weeks since my 58-year-old father died from pancreatic cancer, and I am enjoined for the next eleven months to awaken near dawn to pray for his soul with a quorum of 10 people, a minyan.

I anticipated only having to say Kaddish, the words declaring publicly that I still believe in God, despite this terrible pain and suffering.

Isn't that enough of a challenge?

But each morning, I am faced with an even greater test. I must ponder a series of dense philosophical and ontological questions. I am barely stirring, yet I ask:

What are we? What is our life? What is our goodness, etc.

Often I think to myself: Why questions? I need answers now, more than ever, not more questions. God is so frustrating.

I want so much to skip them. But I can't seem to escape their grasp. They are the gateway to the Kaddish. Without them I cannot enter.

Some mornings the questions mock me. Should I know their answers? Am I supposed to have an epiphany and know miraculously the meaning of my life and the essence of my soul? Is God waiting for me to slam closed my prayer book one day and announce, "I finally know the answers to the questions before us. I am going home. I will not be back"?

And yet other mornings, surprisingly, they comfort me. I think God does not have the answers, and neither do I. We will travel this unknown road together, partnered for the journey.

But who truly is this God without answers?

I was told in my youth that God was perfect, all-powerful and all-knowing. In the book of Genesis, when God asked Cain, "Where is your brother Abel?" I was told that God knew all along that Cain had killed his brother. He only asked him rhetorically, giving him a chance to admit his guilt.

That God often was the only driving force behind my ethical behavior. The Safeway manager may not have seen me take the caramel from the bin, but God definitely saw me do it. God knows everything about everyone all the time.

What happened to that God?

What happened to that wise, old man with a gray beard who could answer any question and ease my troubled soul?

Abraham Joshua Heschel, one of the outstanding Jewish thinkers of the 20th century, said, "We never say three times a day, in the Shema: 'Hear, O Israel, God is perfect!' Rather we say: 'Hear, O Israel, God is One!' One God means: No one is ever alone."

It seems today God is here to search along with me. God is here to share my prayers, to weep my tears, and to struggle to find meaning through this daunting time. As I question, it seems God questions.

Why did my father die? I know that God and I are without answers. But over the next eleven months and probably over many years, we will keep asking, together.

"Kaddish, page One Hundred and Eleven," the shaliach tzibbur, the leader of the minyan, announces. I rise, although I barely heard him. I am lost in my questions. But I am not alone.

Who is

THERE IS NO ONE authoritative Jewish conception of God, although all Jewish thinkers agree that God is one and invisible. Among the range of views, some emphasize God's otherness (transcendence), while others emphasize God's accessibility (immanence). Some emphasize the personal aspects of God, some the impersonal; some stress God's supernaturalism, while others stress God as process. Some see God as a masculine figure, others as a neutral or androgynous being with elements of a masculine and feminine goddess. Each of these views is an authentic Jewish view. They are authentic because they are honest attempts by committed Jewish thinkers to explore ideas about God within the context of Jewish tradition.

Does this mean that all Jewish formulations of theism, pantheism and other views of God are equally valid? Perhaps the diversity of Jewish points of view on God demonstrates that genuine certainty and knowledge of God are impossible. God may be unknowable despite human efforts to find God in heaven, nature, and human relationships. A legitimate point of view, given the range of Jewish conceptions of God, is agnosticism. This is not the agnosticism of doubt but the principled and reasoned admission of the impossibility of knowing about God that is coupled with the impulse to search for knowledge of Him. This search takes place through study of religious texts, intuitive understanding and personal experience.

ACCORDING TO KABBALAH, there is a curtain that divides our reality into two realms, which Kabbalah identifies as the 1 percent and the 99 percent. The 1-percent realm encompasses our physical world. But this is only a tiny fraction of all creation. It is only what we perceive with our five senses – what we can smell, taste, touch, see and hear.

On the other side of the curtain lies the 99 percent, which encompasses the vast majority of reality.

In the 1-percent realm, life has an annoying habit of catching us off guard. We are afflicted with something called the Suddenly Syndrome:

He had a sudden heart attack!
All of a sudden, he walked out on her.
Suddenly, we're short of cash.
The deal suddenly fell through.
She suddenly changed her mind.
The doctors suddenly found a lump.
Life suddenly felt so empty.

But is there really such a thing as "suddenly"? Kabbalah says no. Absolutely not. There is always a concealed, unseen cause that precedes any "sudden" event.

Did you ever wake up in the morning to suddenly find a full-grown oak tree standing tall on your front lawn? Of course not. Somewhere in the past a seed was planted. When a nasty problem suddenly pops up and cuts off the flow of happiness that was fulfilling a particular desire of yours, according to Kabbalah, this is not just some random, chaotic event. There exists a deeper cause. Somewhere in the past, a seed was planted.

"Think of it this way: If you alter a branch of a tree, you change the branch. Modify a leaf, and you change the leaf. But if you can manipulate the genetic information inside the seed, you can affect the entire tree."

There is another side to this curtain – the 99 percent – and it is ultimately far more important. According to Kabbalah, the 99-percent realm is the source of all lasting fulfillment. All knowledge, wisdom and joy dwell in this realm. This is the domain the kabbalists call Light. Whenever we experience joy, we've made contact with this realm through some action that has taken place in the 1-percent realm. It might be from the hug of your child. Or perhaps you just closed a significant business deal. But the joy you feel flows from the 99 percent.

Before Thomas Edison, civilization lived pretty much in the dark compared to the 24-hour, neon-lit, fluorescent-glowing, halogen-burning world of today. But did Edison really invent something new when he produced the first light bulb? Or did the information on how to build a light bulb already exist?

Did Albert Einstein actually discover something new with his Theory of Relativity, or was it always there?

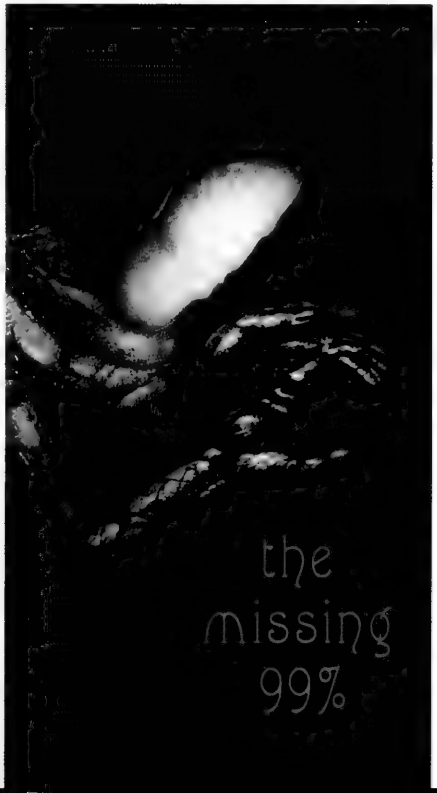
Did Isaac Newton invent gravity when he discovered its properties, or did gravity always exist?

Edison, Einstein and Newton merely uncovered things that already existed. So where was all this information hiding before these great minds uncovered it? The answer is in the 99-percent world.

Mozart said that he was able to conceive entire symphonies in his mind before he wrote a single note. When he mentally experienced an hour of music in just a split second, Mozart felt that he was tapping into another reality. He was transcending the laws of time and space, and entering a spiritual dimension.

Professor Dr. Stuart Hameroff, along with Oxford physicist Roger Penrose, developed The Penrose-Hameroff "Orch OR" model of consciousness.

Dr. Hameroff was intrigued by the ancient kabbalists' description of the 99-percent realm and its similarity to the quantum mechanical view of our universe.



Hameroff explains that for 100 years, it has been known that there exist two worlds, the classical world and the quantum world. We live in the classical world where everything seems "normal" (if unfulfilling). Everything has a definite shape, place and substance. However, at very small scales the quantum world reigns and everything is strange and bizarre, defying common sense.

Science knows very little about the quantum world, but there are indications that the quantum world could qualify as the 99-percent world, and that a curtain does indeed exist between the two worlds.

There is one nagging obstacle – it's our inability to control the moments of connection to the 99-percent realm. Accessing this dimension of Light is accidental and haphazard at best.

Imagine: if we could access this realm at will, we would gain the ability to control all the events in our lives. Instead of dealing with symptoms and effects, we could discover the hidden forces behind chaotic circumstances and maddening events that "suddenly" end our happiness.

Think of it this way: If you alter a branch of a tree, you change the branch. Modify a leaf, and you change the leaf. But if you can manipulate the genetic information inside the seed, you can affect the entire tree – branches, leaves, fruit, the whole shebang.

The realm of the 99 percent is the DNA level of reality: the seed. The root. The cause of all causes.

The whole purpose of Kabbalah's wisdom is to empower people with the particular tools that will allow one to connect to this sacred realm of Light. Connecting to the 99 percent is how we remove darkness from this world and from our personal lives. Darkness comes in many shades, including depression, discontent, disease, destruction and even death. A principle feature of Light is its ability to banish any form of darkness.

Put simply, a darkened auditorium must respond to the light of a single candle. But no matter how much more darkness one adds – say, by enlarging the auditorium – no amount of darkness can snuff out the light.

This is a very profound phenomenon. When you grasp this, you've grasped the power of Kabbalah.

THIS HOSPITAL, like every other, is a hole in the universe through which holiness issues in blasts. It blows both ways, in and out of time. Onwards above and below me, men and women are dying. Their hearts seize, give out, or clatter, their kidneys fail, their lungs harden or drown, their brains clog or jam and die for blood. Their awarenesses lower like lamp wicks. Off they go, these many great and beloved people, as death subtracts them one by one from the living – about 164,300 of them a day worldwide, and 6,000 a day in the United States – and the hospitals shunt their bodies away. Simultaneously, here they come, these many new people, for now absurdly alike – about 10,000 of them a day in this country – as apparently shabby replacements.

At the sink in the maternity ward, nurse Pat Eisberg is unwrapping another package. This infant emerged into the world three weeks early; she is lavender, and goopy with yellow vernix, like a Channel swimmer. As the washcloth rubs her, she pinks up. I cannot read her name. She is alert and silent. She looks about with apparent concentration; she pays great attention, and seems to have a raw drive to think.

She fixes on my eyes and, through them, studies me. I am not sure I can withstand such scrutiny, but I can, because she is just looking, purely looking, as if she were inspecting this world from a new angle. She is, perhaps for the first time, looking into eyes, but serenely, as if she does not mind whose eyes she meets. What does it matter, after all? It is life that glistens in her eyes; it is a calm consciousness that connects with volts the ocular nerves and working brain. She has a self, and she knows it; the red baby knew it too.

When Krishna's mother looked inside his mouth, she saw in his throat the night sky filled with all the stars in the cosmos. She saw "the far corners of the sky, and the wind, and lightning, and the orb of the Earth.... and she saw her own village and herself." Wordsworth's "trailing clouds of glory" refers to newborns; they trail clouds of glory as they come.

These immediate newborns – those on the left counter, and those washed ones on the right – are keenly interested. None cries. They look about slowly, moving their eyes. They do not speak, as trees do not speak. They do seem wise, as though they understood that their new world, however strange, was only another shade in a streaming marvel they had known from the beginning.

The Talmud states that fetuses in the womb study Torah, and learn it by heart. They also see, moments before birth, all the mingled vastness of the universe, and its volumes of time, and its multitudes of peoples trampling the generations under. These unborn children are in a holy state. An angel comes to each one, however, just before he is born, and taps his lips so he forgets all he knows and joins the bewildered human race.

In a few hours, this oracular newborn here in the hospital will lose her alertness. She will open her eyes infrequently. She will be quite obviously unable to focus. Her glee will come later, if she lives, and her love later still. For now, she will sleep and cry and suck and be wonderful enough.

The nurse wipes her forehead on a sleeve. The lights are hot. She reaches for another one.

"Now you," she says.

Are we ready to think of all humanity as a living tree, carrying on splendidly without us? We easily regard a beehive or an ant colony as a single organism, and even a school of fish, a flock of dunlin, a herd of elk. And we easily and correctly regard an aggregate of individuals, a sponge or coral or lichen or slime mold, as one creature – but us? When we people differ, and know our consciousness, and love?

Even lovers, even twins, are strangers who will love and die alone. And we like it this way, at least in the West; we prefer to endure any agony of isolation rather than to merge and extinguish our selves in an abstract "humanity" whose fate we should hold dearer than our own. Who could say, I'm in agony because my child died, but that's all right: Mankind as a whole has abundant children?

The religious idea sooner or later challenges the notion of the individual. The Buddha taught each disciple to vanquish his fancy that he possessed an individual self. Huston Smith suggests that our individuality resembles that of a snowflake: The seas evaporate water, clouds build and lose water in snowflakes, which dissolve and go to sea. The simile galls. What have I to do with the ocean, I with my unique and novel hexagons and spikes? Is my very mind a wave in the ocean, a wave the wind flattens, a flaw the wind draws like a finger?

We know we must yield, if only intellectually. Okay, we're a lousy snowflake. Okay, we're a tree. These dead loved ones we mourn were only those brown lower branches a tree shades and kills as it grows; the tree itself is thriving. But what kind of tree are we growing here, that could be worth such waste and pain? For each of us loses all we love, everyone we love. We grieve and leave. What marvels shall these future whizzes, damn their eyes, accomplish?

"Are we ready to think of all humanity as a living tree, carrying on splendidly without us?"

A STORY IS TOLD OF A Jewish man who was riding on the subway reading a Nazi newspaper. A friend of his, who happened to be riding in the same subway car, noticed this strange phenomenon. Very upset, he approached the newspaper reader: "Moshe, have you lost your mind? Why are you reading a Nazi newspaper?"

Moshe replied: "I used to read the Jewish newspapers, but what did I find? Jews being persecuted, Israel being attacked, Jews disappearing through assimilation and intermarriage, Jews living in poverty. So I switched to the Nazi newspaper. Now what do I find? Jews own all the banks, Jews control the media, Jews are all rich and powerful, Jews rule the world. The news is so much better!"

The sad and painful message of this story is that history has not been easy on the Jewish people. Somehow, though, we have managed to keep our sense of humor!

In each generation, including our own, we have faced vicious enemies seeking our destruction. They do not care to know us as individual human beings; they do not try to understand our ideals, our hopes, our needs. They are satisfied to stereotype, dehumanize and caricature us. They turn all "facts" against us. From generation to generation, they pass on a profound hatred of Jews.

They torment us with their violence and hate-filled propaganda. They pervert truth to make our suffering all the more painful. The Nazis and their sympathizers murdered six million innocent Jews during the Holocaust: and now anti-Semites deny that the Holocaust ever happened! The Arab nations deprived Jews of basic rights for centuries; then made war on the Jewish state, boycotted it, maligned it, discriminated against it in every possible way; and then they got the United Nations to condemn Israel for racism!

Perhaps the anti-Semites have always hated Jews because Jews are the conscience of the world. The Torah has taught great ideals that the anti-Semites find threatening: for example, that all human beings are created in the image of God; that all are responsible for their deeds; that human beings must have compassion for each other and not try to convert or coerce the other; and that generosity is superior to greed. But the anti-Semites prefer the ways of violence and repression, exploitation and dehumanization. They prefer to scapegoat the Jewish people rather than to confront their own shortcomings.

Thinking about the millennia of abuse aimed against us, a question arises: How is it that the Jewish people, by and large, are characterized by an over-arching optimism and a positive, future-oriented view of life? Why haven't we given up on humanity? Why do we work so hard to make the world a better place for all people, Jewish and non-Jewish?

In my 32 years as a rabbi and communal activist, I have often been amazed by the many signs of Jewish commitment to humanity, to the future. Jews are involved in a vast array of social action organizations and causes. We give a tremendous amount of charity. There is hardly a humanitarian, cultural or educational enterprise that has not drawn support from Jews. Jewish men and women, religious and not so religious, have devoted their time and energy to tikkun olam, making the world a better place for everyone. In spite of condemnations from the United Nations, in spite of anti-Israel bias throughout the world, in spite of suicide murders of Israelis, the people of Judaism and Israel remain an idealistic nation, committed to a brighter future.

Yes, we sometimes become depressed and frustrated. But only for the moment. In essence, we are imbued with a belief in a better tomorrow. We have not been broken by the thousands of years of persecutions, pogroms and propaganda we have endured; we will not be broken now.

Are we hopelessly naïve? Do we entirely misread the depth and breadth of anti-Jewish sentiment? Is our faith in God and in humanity so extraordinarily strong as to defy centuries of suffering inflicted on us, centuries of evidence that hatred can persist and even triumph?

Are we foolish? Are we the wisest and most idealistic people in the world? Are we all of these things?

The mystery of Jewish survival is one of the mysteries of human civilization. But an even greater mystery is how we Jews have managed to survive a brutal history while still remaining optimistic, idealistic and dedicated to helping build a better world. I don't have a clear answer to this enigma, but I am proud to be part of the problem.

The moral excitement in the Book of Job is the sufferer's outrage at God's refusal to do justice. It centers on a search for the roots of unfairness in the real world, despite the promises elsewhere in the Bible of God's punishment of the evildoer and reward to the good. Even the most devout believers have asked themselves: If life is unfair; if the good often die young and the wicked prosper; if Man cannot depend on God for a fair shake in the end – then what is the purpose of ethical behavior, of faith, of worship? The author of the book (identity unknown, called poet-Job to distinguish him from his character) broke with the pious illusion of divine retribution and came to grips with the mysterious disorder of real life. He tried to answer the hardest question:

How do believers cope with the fickleness of fate?

All of us deal with that unfairness issue, at all levels and throughout our lives. Every parent is familiar with the acute sense of fairness in the minds of children, especially those with older siblings: My daughter, at age four, used to drive us up the wall – for example, on the subject of comparative bedtimes – with the repeated challenge "That's unfair!" (I taught Annabel to say "that's inequitable," an offbeat locution which, coming from a child, puzzled her playmates but made her complaining more tolerable at home.) Later in life, the perception of unfairness leads to deeper questioning. When the system does not produce promised results, where do you go to complain? Who's accountable for moral mismanagement? When God appears to be uninterested in mankind or loafing on the job of moral law enforcement, can there be such a thing as devout defiance?

SHABBAT AT KOL Shofar, our shul in Tiburon, California, ten minutes beyond the Golden Gate Bridge, comes replete with questions. Our Rabbi, Lavey Derby, has made questions the centerpiece of his Shabbat d'rash, the 30 minutes he devotes to exploring the weekly Torah portion. Or more precisely, the 30 minutes we devote to the weekly portion, for Rabbi Derby has brilliantly fashioned the best of Socratic pedagogy to engage the congregation in a discussion whose central points invariably are proffered by congregants in response to a core of questions he has posed.

By framing and buttressing congregants' contributions, Rabbi Derby masterfully architects a compelling learning session, with each congregant comment serving as timber for the impromptu house of knowledge collectively being built. Congregants spiritedly challenge one another, evoking the tradition of chevrusa, when students pair off to study and debate text. It's a marvel of pedagogic engineering as we productively probe the meaning of that week's text. Visitors to our shul at first are baffled by what they see and hear: a rabbi coming out from behind the Bima (his "stage") to face them without obstruction, who then informs them that their pre-lunch hunger pangs will go unheeded until his questions are suitably taken up.

In other words, this is not your father's sermon, and certainly not your zayde's; rather it is a community learning opportunity, which we interactively embrace through asking questions and positing not so much "answers" as "meanings" or "interpretations."

> "In other words, this is not your father's sermon, and certainly not your zayde's."

Several weeks ago we read Ki Tissa, the portion renowned for the Golden Calf incident, but one that also further describes the construction of the tabernacle and punctuates that with an additional injunction to keep the Shabbat. Rabbi Derby chose to delve into the Shabbat dimension and challenged us to wrestle with the concept of "rest." What kind of rest was intended for Shabbat? Deliberate rest or casual rest? What's the difference? What intentionality lies behind both? How aware of resting ought one to be? We did not rest until we'd rendered a spectrum of meaning.

The prior Shabbat, we read Parshat Zachor as we do each year on the Shabbat immediately preceding Purim. "The holidays will be abrogated, the Talmud teaches us," led off Rabbi Derby, "upon the arrival of the Messiah, for there will essentially no longer be a need to observe them and heed their lessons – except for one. Which holiday will live on, post-Messiah?" With the reading of Megillat Esther just two days away, it was a transparent question, but what was not nearly as telegraphed was the meaning of the inevitable follow-up question: Why? What was it about Purim that merits a perpetual retelling? The discourse that ensued was lively and inventive.

Judaism's vaunted oral tradition is a latticework of questions and answers begging for subsequent challenge, in which the former is the mortar that girds our faith. Ours is a faith that treasures the indispensability of not knowing and the strength that comes from the pursuit of knowing. At Kol Shofar, we emulate that tradition and in so doing, deepen our faith and understanding.

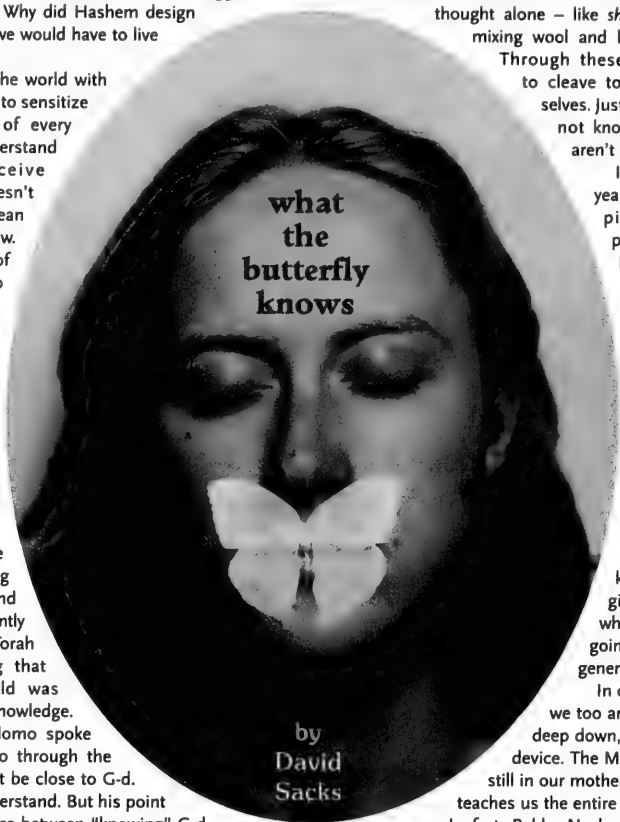
what the butterfly knows

by David Sacks



"WHAT DO WE KNOW, WHAT DO WE KNOW?" Reb Shlomo Carlebach used to say these words all the time, and whenever he did, whoever heard them was instantly put in touch with how deep and mysterious life really is. What do we know? Ask yourself a question: Do you know what's going to happen when you walk down the street today? Do you know what's really going to happen tomorrow? Do you know whom you're going to marry? Or what your kids will be like when they're adults? Do you know the day you are going to die? Can you possibly? So many questions and so much uncertainty about life's biggest issues! The question is, why? Why did Hashem design this world in such a way that we would have to live in a state of "not knowing"?

I think Hashem created the world with all its unpredictability in order to sensitize us to the miraculousness of every moment. To cause us to understand that just because we receive something every day, it doesn't make it any less a gift, or mean that it has to be there tomorrow. To see that He is the source of all blessing. In sum, in order to breed nearness to Him.

Not only is it permissible not to know, but grasping the unknowableness of life is the foundation of humility and inner peace. If this is the case, then the first question we must ask is, what's so bad about knowing?

Once we "know" something, it feels old, even dead. The fact that we can look at the stars at night or the astonishing variety of fruits, animals and personalities and not be constantly amazed is death. In fact, the Torah teaches that the very thing that brought death into the world was when we ate from the Tree of Knowledge.

Time and again, Reb Shlomo spoke about how it's possible to go through the Talmud five times and still not be close to G-d. At first this seems hard to understand. But his point was that there's a big difference between "knowing" G-d and intimacy with the Divine. When I got married, Reb Shlomo blessed my wife and me that we should never stop surprising each other. Because when you really think you know all there is to know about someone, the life of the relationship is drained. It follows then that the worst thing would be to reach a state where we feel like we "know" G-d.

"Not knowing" is very different from ignorance. Torah study is one of the greatest mitzvahs possible. This raises a conundrum: How do we go about increasing in learning while still maintaining our freshness and sense of wonder? I once asked Reb Shlomo this question. He said a person has to treat each new thing learned as a piece in a larger puzzle that still has pieces missing. For most people, every new piece of information becomes another thing that they "know" – an attainment in and of itself. But with Reb Shlomo's teaching, each new thing learned can be a gentle reminder of how little we know – a hand reaching out, beckoning us to a previously unexplored realm.

I remember a friend once asked me, at a critical moment in my Jewish growth, whether an ant can out-think a man. I said of course not. And he said, "Then how can man out-think G-d? We make the mistake of making G-d too small, of trying to make G-d fit into our limited consciousness instead of glorying in the fact that He is so beyond what we can ever know. Ultimately the mind is just one of our faculties. There's a deeper, more intuitive place within us. One of the beautiful aspects of Torah is that there is an entire category of laws, called chukim, designed specifically to nurture this place within us. These are laws which cannot be understood through rational thought alone – like shatnez, the prohibition against mixing wool and linen together in garments. Through these commandments we're able to cleave to G-d with the entirety of our selves. Just because we live in a state of not knowing, it doesn't mean that we aren't being led.

I was listening to NPR a few years ago and heard an unusual piece about the migratory patterns of the Monarch butterfly. Every year the butterfly colony starts in Mexico and travels up to Canada. The unusual thing is that the life span of a Monarch is very short, and researchers found that the ones who actually make it to Canada are four generations removed from the ones who began the journey.

This is amazing! It means that every butterfly heading toward Canada has never been to Canada before, doesn't know how to get there, and yet gives birth to another generation which also doesn't know where it's going, and yet sure enough, the last generation makes it there every time!

In our own lives, and as a people, we too are heading toward a place, and deep down, every one of us has a homing device. The Midrash teaches that while we're still in our mother's womb, an angel comes and teaches us the entire Torah.

In fact, Rebbe Nachman of Breslov says that every step a Jew takes is a step toward Israel. Even if it seems like he's going in the opposite direction, even if he doesn't know where he's going, nonetheless, he's heading toward Israel.

Rabbi Chaim Shmuelevitz, the Mirrer Rosh Yeshiva, gives the beautiful example of a mother and baby traveling together to distant places. No matter how far-flung their travels, from the baby's point of view it never moves – it's always right there in its mother's arms. So it is with us. Though we live in a state where we don't know what's coming next, we do know this: That wherever we go, we're always right there in Hashem's arms, being loved and embraced.

"'Not knowing' is very different from ignorance."

A hair from a cup of milk

BY CARLA HOWARD

Raba was sitting before R. Nachman as he lay dying. As he sank close to death, Raba asked R. Nachman to please reappear to him after he died. Rabbi Nachman appeared to him in a dream, and Raba asked him, "Did you suffer pain?" He replied, "As little as in taking a hair from a cup of milk. And if the Holy One, Blessed be He, were to give me the chance to come back to this world I would not, for the dread thereof." (Talmud, Moed Katan 28a)

THE HOSPITAL CALLED me. Could I go visit a young woman with advanced cancer who was in spiritual crisis? When I arrived, I found Nancy, a woman in her mid-forties whose body looked like it should have given up the fight long ago.

She welcomed me, asked about my life, played Jewish geography with me (turns out she'd dated my brother), and thanked me for coming. I asked if I could visit again and she said yes. We saw each other twice a month for three or four months, with no mention of death. I read psalms to her, to try to open a door, but she set the agenda – talk of her cats, her friends, her ex-husband.

One day I arrived when the hospice nurse, Lenore, was changing the dressing on Nancy's wound. They made light conversation back and forth. I turned to Nancy and said, "Is there anything you'd like to ask Lenore?"

"Yes," Nancy said. "What will it be like at the end?"

She wanted the topography of her last breath charted.

Once the answer came and Nancy was reassured that there would be no struggle, she turned to me to get down to business. She wanted to express her love for her best friend who had been through it all with her.

Through the fog of morphine, Nancy placed two drops of water on her knee. With her finger, she blended the two drops into one. Two drops become one. Was she telling us that she and her friend, who even shared her name, would maintain a bond after death?

To be at the bedside of one who is facing death is to get as close as one can to life itself; it is to watch laboring from one existence to another. The umbilicus that connects and sustains us until we reach our destination is invisible. I was once an apprentice midwife. And now I attend the dying. To be a witness at both gates of life is the highest of honors – to stand at the edge of what we don't know, with another human being.

Judaism obligates us all to be there for the sick – the mitzvah of bikur cholim – and all the more so for one who is dying. According to Jewish law, such a person is "regarded as a living being in respect to all matters in the world." (Semachot I)

This means that regardless of which of their faculties may have already left them, they are there, and so must we be. Why? Because something happens when we are. The Psalmist tells us, "Be still, and know that I am God."

"When we care for the sick and dying, the mystery is: Who is healing whom?"

In the profound silence, we find a divine world that we don't know.

Hospice, a word that initially meant hosting a traveler in a way station (as in hostel, hospital and hotel) – a place for those on a pilgrimage to rest – is a way of caring for those at the end of life, to soften the suffering so that it is "as little as taking a hair from a cup of milk." Hospice allows us to manage the pain and cradle the soul, and revere the silence and mystery of life at its end.

A student of mine who had always wrestled with the existence of God was called to the bedside of his dying father. The nurse and other caregivers had been unable to calm his father's agitation as he moved in and out of consciousness. He mumbled words that no one understood. As the son drew close, his father whispered to him in an unfamiliar voice, "What is kadosh? What is kadosh?"

The son was stunned at the question from his father, whom he had always considered to be non-religious. He leaned in and replied, "Dad, it means holy. It's the chant the angels sing to God."

Having heard his son's reply, the father's face relaxed and his breathing calmed.

The son believed that he had helped his father to understand his vision and to lose his fear of dying, while the father had opened a doorway to God for his son.

When we care for the sick and dying, the mystery is: Who is healing whom?

Gaby Wenig of OLAM interviews Master Yoga Instructor Rodney Yee

OLAM: The purpose of this interview is to discuss what we don't know.

Rodney Yee (RY): What we don't know?! I love it! I don't know what I don't know – I just know that I don't know!

OLAM: What don't we know about the way the human body works?

RY: Well, think about what the human body is. Break it down to its smallest part. What is it?

OLAM: A cell?

RY: But what is a cell made of? Atoms. But what are atoms made of? Subatomic particles, spinning around in some unusual pattern. It's miraculous. Why are these subatomic particles spinning this way, to create this thing called the human form? We have no idea what this is.

OLAM: We have no idea of its purpose? What is it exactly that we have no idea about?

RY: We have no idea why it even happens. Why can I look at my hand and actually see something called a hand? Why are the subatomic particles spinning around in this way, instead of spinning around like a lamp or telephone? Why are they taking this form?

To make it more complex, what is the difference between the mind, the body, the breath, or the spirit? Where does one end and the other begin?

OLAM: Are there more things at work in the body than we can identify?

RY: Exactly. There is a huge mystery that we know nothing about.

I mean, what is the awareness behind thinking? What happens when you catch yourself thinking? What is the thing we call the self? This is an age-old mystery that yoga asks, but we can't seem to get a grasp on it at all.

OLAM: What is so mysterious about the mind and the interactions it has with the body?

RY: One of the purposes of yoga is to concentrate the mind. You try concentrating the mind in the body, surfing the movements of the breath and the body, so the observer becomes the observed. That is when the mind fully integrates into the body, without separation – and in yoga, that is reality.

We think that there is a separation between ourselves and the rest of the world, but that is just an illusion. How are you separate from air around you? It's totally mysterious. And if you can start living with realizing that this is all just a total mystery, you realize that there is no identity to hold onto, and that is an amazing freedom.

OLAM: Do you think that identity is a myth? What is identity?

RY: Identity is an orientation. It is a game we play to feel like we know where we are.

I am 45 years old now, but internally I feel like I am 17. Whenever I got this identity, it didn't change until I realized I was holding on to this concept of me because it was convenient, and I could believe in it. But then I thought, "Why should I believe in something that is not real?"

To me, that is the crux and that is the ridiculousness. That is living the illusion, and that is what yoga is trying to break.

OLAM: So you think people should embrace what they don't know?

RY: I think basically they should realize that most people don't know a thing about what will take place. The unknown is always happening and is a major part of your life. So security is a ridiculous thought, because you have no idea.

We are scamming ourselves, believing in identity, trying to feel like there is some permanence. There is no permanence. The unknown is happening to us right now. You have no idea what I am going to say. I have no idea what you are going to ask me!

OLAM: True! What do you think are the enigmas inherent in yoga? What is it about yoga that we don't understand?

RY: Yoga to me is an ongoing experiment in communication between the mind, the body and the breath, whatever those are. It is an ongoing search to clarify – not to identify, but to get a direct relationship taking place.

I think people relate to what they think yoga is, instead of having an ongoing fluctuation of movement of reality. People say, "I did my yoga practice," but what does that mean? You repeated something that you did yesterday? That is not a real relationship. That is a relationship to an image.

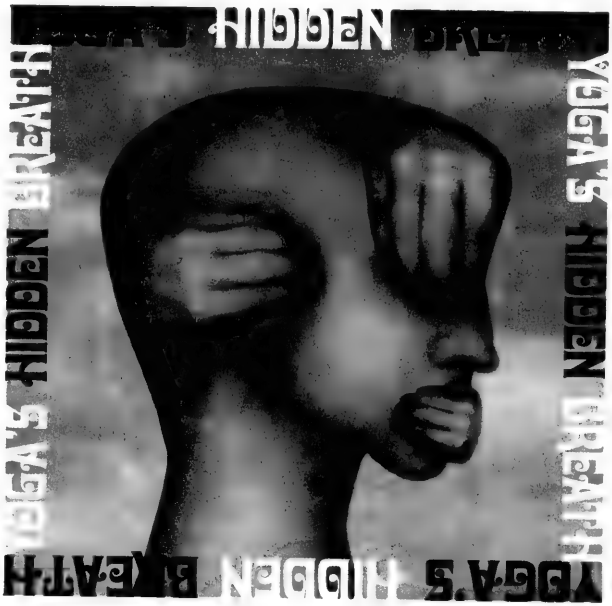
To me, yes, the yoga is the relationship to the mystery, not to something you already know.

OLAM: What is the more pure state? Knowing or not knowing?

RY: I think the state goes back and forth between the two. Is knowledge more valuable than not knowing? Well, if you didn't have the knowledge of not knowing, then you wouldn't know that you didn't know. And if you didn't have the not knowing, then in some ways you could never learn more. The acknowledgement of not knowing leads to curiosity and it leads to finding out.

You have to balance "What do I know?" "What do I think I know?" and "What do I for sure not know?" You need all three.

I mean, people knew the world was flat – that was a fact. We agree that we know better now – but then, is knowledge true? We don't have a clue.



"Yoga is the relationship to the mystery, not to something you already know."

WHEN I WAS 25, I suddenly got it into my head that my father was going to die. He was perfectly healthy at the time, but I was overcome with a feeling of certainty that he was about to die violently – possibly on his way to visit me where I was living, possibly before he left New York, where he lived. I was inconsolable, and though nowadays this might be called some kind of panic attack, at the time I had plenty to bolster my fear.

Item: My father worked at the edge of the public eye, with important people, including, occasionally, Israeli prime ministers. There had been terrorism abroad and assassination at home. Maybe no one would go after him, I thought, but he could certainly be in the wrong place at the wrong time.

Item: My father lived in New York City, and the crime rate then was very high. He liked walking to the corner newsstand around midnight and getting the next day's New York Times. He rode subways at night, too, and especially enjoyed walking home from restaurants after a late dinner.

And of course he flew everywhere, to see family, to conventions, to Israel for work. Once he even took a vacation – to London, when the IRA was bombing department stores.

There is always trouble in the world, but my father came to visit me that spring and nothing happened, and my fear faded away. He died almost 20 years later of cancer in his own bed, having lived in the meantime a life of tremendous energy, variety and fearlessness. Though he, no less than someone who went to work at Cantor Fitzgerald the morning of September 11, never knew what was coming.

We don't know the future, and we can't know the future – and somehow this seems increasingly galling as we humans learn so much about everything else. We can split the atom, track a hurricane, see plaque building up in arteries before there's any hint of chest pain – but still we are powerless to know about the car that will zip around the corner as we're crossing the street, or when the company we work for will go under.

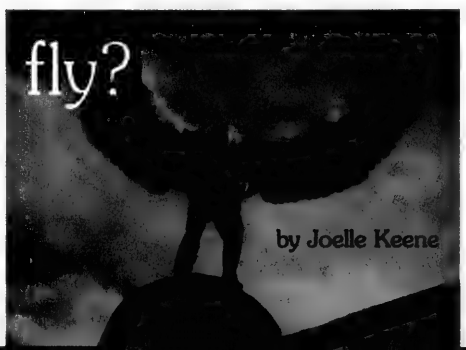
The future is God's. God, it is said, holds the keys to birth, death and rain, rain being both the reality and an archetypal symbol of sustenance for all of life on earth. He hands us pieces of the puzzle, He teaches us how to irrigate and raise crops, and how to conceive a baby in a petri dish. But He does not reveal what's coming. Perhaps it should be said God also holds the keys to time.

As I write this evening, I hold tickets to Israel for my whole family. We are scheduled to leave in just a few days, along with many of our friends, on a synagogue trip. I want to go to stand in God's light and feel His presence as I have heard it can be felt there. We want to pray at the Wall and let God know how grateful we are for all we have, and a little closer to His ears perhaps, to hope that He will really hear our prayers. We want to climb Masada and look out on holy land, and take our children to where the street signs are in Hebrew and the kosher restaurants serve Indian, fast food and Chinese.

We can get there in less than a day, flying over continents a nd seas – and nearby will be people, dozens or hundreds or thousands, who seem to want to kill us, one by one.

So – should we go?

If disaster should strike, would it have been worth it? How will I live with myself if something happens that would not have if we hadn't gone?



"No man can see Me and live," God tells Moses in Exodus 33:20. We make decisions like this in the dark – period. What we know of what to do comes from Torah, which contains so much instruction. It is not given to us to know; it is given to us to serve: to cross that street to get our child to school, to drive around that corner to buy candles for Shabbat, to fly so we can honor a parent on her birthday. We'll cross a parking lot in the dark to buy medicine, or climb the stairs at the World Trade Center to save a life, risking our own.

It's not given to us to know – but we will marry our sweetheart, and we will have children, hoping for the best. We are not like the cow who nibbles each day from the same field, or the squirrel for whom Thursday and Saturday are the same. We yearn, we long, we dream.

For God does give us hope. To deny it is to set conditions for our humanity: I won't be human, God, unless You guarantee it will all turn out well! In that sense, flying to Israel is no different from standing under the chuppah. Demanding to know as a condition for doing what's right is a kind of blasphemy; it seeks a fundamental adjustment of Creation itself. It is a non-acceptance of our humanity, a denial of our holy possibilities.

Since we can't know what will happen, there has to be a good reason for getting on a plane – and, for that matter, for going out into the morning rush hour. Everything we do should be holy work, in which case to turn away from it would be to turn from God Himself.

I thought about asking my father not to come visit me that spring, but something stopped me from even broaching the subject. What was it? It was a respect for his humanity – his particular energy, his verve. Asking him to fear would be asking him not to live. I wanted him to live as long as possible.

"Therefore choose life, that you may live," says Moses in Deuteronomy 30:19.

So we will face Jerusalem and go, knowing we don't know.

Joelle Keene, Associate Editor of OLAM, returned from Israel in February. (It was great!)

Last October, OLAM Founder and Editor David Suissa sat down with Rabbi Zalman Schachter-Shalomi at his home in Boulder, Colorado, for an evening of philosophy, learning and song. At one point, David asked, "Tell me – where does our knowledge end? What is it that we don't know?" "Hit the record button," Rabbi Zalman answered. "This is important."

THERE IS A PSALM THAT GOES AS follows: "You fools among the people, try and understand, When will you fools get some wisdom? The One who plants an ear, does He not hear? The One who plants an eye, does He not see? The One who reproves the nations, does He not know? The One who teaches knowledge?" (Psalm 94:8-10)

There is some understanding we gain when we ask ourselves "How do we know what we know?" If something comes through the senses, then I don't know what it is, until I label the experience by joining the collusion of people who say "This is brown, this is white." The senses themselves do not naturally have words associated with them. So we have to give them words. Feelings are even deeper and more deprived of words, because we have to borrow words from sensation to describe them, as we say "this is bitter" or "this is so sweet."

When it comes to the intellect, we have many words, but when it comes to intuition, we have no words at all.

The reason for this is that our brain is made in the following way: The bottom part of the brain is called "The Reptilian." It is very primitive, and it is all about my turf, my food, flight and fight. It corresponds to the lowest level in Assiyah, the world of action.

Then we have another part of the brain called the "Limbic Brain." We share this part with mammals. It loves rhythm, loves to sing, enjoys being an "us" – and this is where feelings are. This is the region that vibrates to our connection with the world of Yetzirah, or formation.

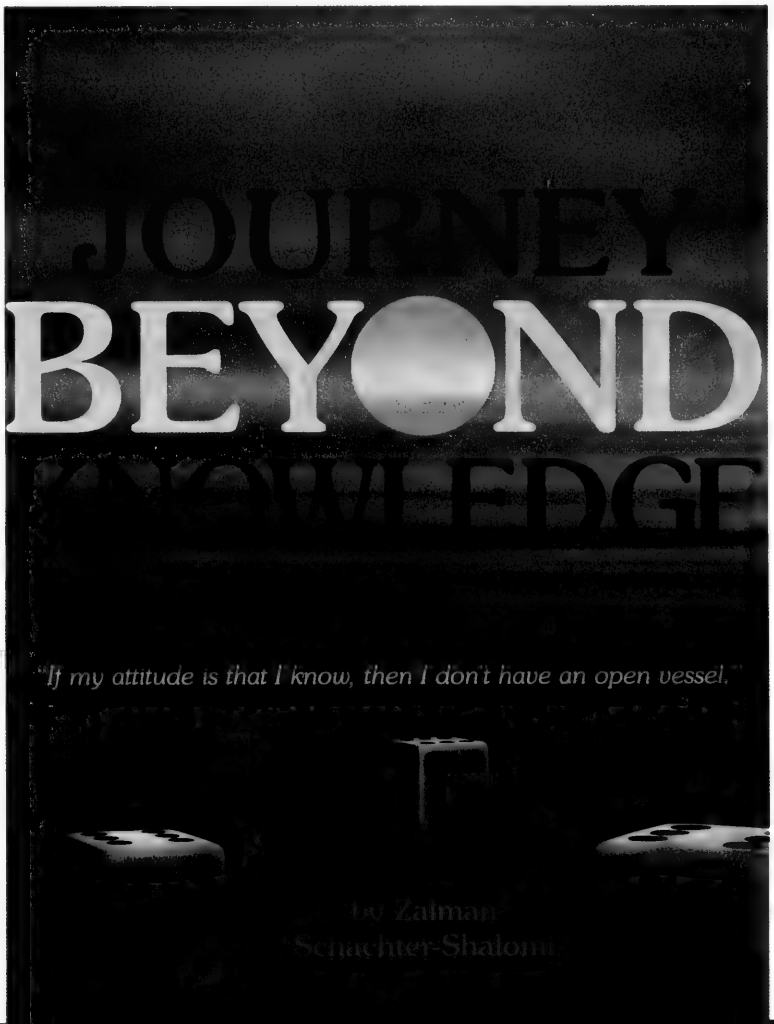
Reason is contained in a third major component of the brain: the neo-cortex. Here we work with ideas and theories. In this part of the brain we can meet God in Torah. Here we vibrate with the world of Briyah, or creation.

Still, even the most conscious of us fail to use 85 percent of our brain capacity. It is like having a big hard drive with only 15 percent of it formatted. That unformatted part, where much of the neshamah (soul) is at home, has fractal attributes of the loftiest region. It is "the head that knows not and is not knowable." (Zohar III Idra Zuta p.288b)

When we get information through our intuition, we don't know where it comes from. And most of the time, this shocks people. They ask "How do you know?" and I say "I know, but don't know how I know." Because "The wisdom comes from the nothing place." (Job 28:12)

If I want to get to wisdom, I have to be open to the nothing place.

If my attitude is that I know, then I don't have an open vessel.



There is something about knowing that always has to do with the past and not the future. When I say "I know it already," I am looking through the rear view mirror. When I say, "I don't know yet," I am looking ahead, through the windshield.

In Hebrew there are two words for the English word why. One is "lamah", the other is "madua." Madua is etiological, which means that I go back to the past and work out what caused me to do something.

The other word, lamah, has its root in the word "l'-mah", which means "To what end." To what end do I want to do it? And that is in the future. In order to be able to get anything from the future, I have to be in the place of not knowing.

People whose minds are closed say, "If it isn't in a text from before, then it doesn't exist." What we are saying is "What do you think? Did Hashem stop communicating with us now? In fact, there is a future that is drawing us."

Of course, we don't have all the answers yet. If we had all the answers, we wouldn't need Mashiach. We do need Mashiach because we don't know. The Talmud says "[When] I don't know the answer to something I say teiku – which means Eliyahu will come and give us the answer to that." Now, why should I have to wait for Eliyahu to come and give me the answer? Because our capacity for complexity has not yet been developed. When people want to make everything simple, they see it in black and white and run away from the complexity in the world.

An example of this is the white spaces of the Torah. Reb Levi Yitzchak of Berditchev asked: "Why is it that Az Yashir, the song of the sea, has to be written like bricks – with spaces in between?" He answered his question, saying: "Until Mashiach comes, we are only able to read the black letters. When Mashiach comes, we will be able to read the white spaces between."

Translated into psychology, the black letters are the figures, the white letters are the ground. Reb Levi was pointing out that what connects the letters is the white space. No letter in the Torah can touch another letter, and it is the white spaces that prevent this. Now, there is a verse in Jeremiah that says "A female surrounds the male." (Jerem. 31:21) The female, meaning the Torah of Shechinah, begins with not knowing. About the Shechinah, it says "It does not have anything by herself – she is like the moon. All the light that she has is the light that she receives." Even in her dark light, the moon attracts the water and the tides; so, too, the Shechinah attracts the infinite. How does it attract the infinite? By asking questions, by not knowing.

So the Shechinah keeps asking: "Mi barah eileh? Who has created all this?" And when we talk about God, what do we mean? The collection of all the souls. And what do all the souls say? They all say "Fill me, God, teach me, God."

So we come with our not knowing, and our not knowing is the white spaces between the letters – and if they weren't there, if you were to print black on black, we couldn't see anything.

"The admission of not knowing is the prelude to redemption and revelation."

Therefore, if we can create the white spaces that are in our mind, we can achieve the state of not knowing which will enable us to see.

Following these thoughts was a discussion between Rabbi Zalman and David Suissa, transcribed below:

David Suissa: You know, in graphics, the white spaces are also important. They get you noticed. We live in a world where we are so bombarded with stimuli and so talked down to that it is almost suffocating. Ironically, it's the white space – the visual silence – that screams the loudest. It gives the viewer a little space to enter.

Rabbi Zalman: Let's try a shared, socialized meditation: I am going to say half a sentence and you are going to finish it. You don't know what I am going to say, and I don't know what you are going to say. Then you are going to have to say a half sentence in connection with the first, and the same thing. Let's begin.

Rabbi Zalman: One of the functions of not knowing is...

David Suissa: To instill a sense of humility in us, so that we can rise up and...

Rabbi Zalman: Encounter our own souls. Once we realize that our soul is...

David Suissa: Organically connected with God, then we are able to...

Rabbi Zalman: Experience that connection with joy and with ecstasy. That will bring us to a place where...

David Suissa: We can identify with the essential place of every other human being, which gets us to a place...

Rabbi Zalman: Where we see our sameness and the God within the other. When that happens there is...

David Suissa: True love. The love that comes from...

Rabbi Zalman: The shared experience of being children of God.

As you can see, David, because we both don't know what is going to happen, it lets the spirit in you come out. It is written, "The question of the wise is half of the answer." If we could provide a list of all the things that bother us, that would be half the quest. From our not knowing we might come to knowing.

If someone says, "I have the question and I've got the answer," then it is a lie. They come with the answer before the question and they construct the answer around the question. Then it is not a real question, because it is tainted by smugness.

Smugness closes all doors so that one is locked in. There is no smugness in the white space of not knowing.

A real question comes from 'Eini yodea' – I really don't know. The admission of not knowing is the prelude to redemption and revelation. So Moshe Rabbenu himself said: "We won't know with what we shall serve God until we get there." (Exodus 10:26)

Rabbi Zalman Schachter-Shalomi has been at the forefront of pioneering Jewish spiritual renewal, and is one of the world's foremost experts in Chassidus. His most recent book is From Age-ing to Sage-ing (Time Warner, 1998). This article was transcribed and edited by Gaby Wenig.

A WEALTHY STRANGER ONCE arrived in a village and saw a blind beggar sitting close by the village gate. As he approached, he noticed something very unusual about the beggar's situation. Next to him was a large cage, filled with food and drink. "Why do you sit here and beg when you already have plenty of food for yourself?" he asked the beggar indignantly. The beggar smiled and then responded, "I have always been poor and rarely have known what it is to sleep with a full stomach. The food I have gathered here is for those who are experiencing hunger for the first time. For surely tonight they will be far hungrier than I have ever been."

For most of us, too, hunger is also a stranger. We rarely question that at the end of each day there will be food on our table. But questions remain. How is it possible, for instance, that throughout the world 24,000 people die each day from starvation? How can it be that in the United States, the most prosperous nation in human history, 31 million people go to sleep at night unsure of the source of their next meal? Is it really true that the world's aggregate food supply almost triples its needs, yet millions of children still suffer from chronic malnutrition?

Such statistics are numbing but convey only a small part of this worldwide tragedy. For largely unrecognized is the permanent imprint hunger can leave on the human soul.

This lesson was not lost on Rabbi Spira of Bluzhov during the Holocaust.

Deported with his twin sons to the Nazi labor camp of Janowska, Rabbi Spira was assigned work duty one day with one of his sons, cleaning the prisoners' barracks. During the day a particularly sadistic guard shot his son in the leg and then ordered him to stand. When he struggled to do so the guard shot him in the other leg. When he failed to stand the second time, the guard pumped the boy with bullets. He died instantly. Distraught, the rabbi wondered how he would explain the death of the boy to his younger brother. When the boy returned from his work detail that day, extremely hungry as usual, the father told him that his brother was sick and his life might be in danger. In fact, he said, it was possible that he had already died.

The boy began to wail inconsolably. Refusing to be comforted, he blurted: "Today was his day to look after the bread. I left all my rations with him and now what will I eat?" Stunned by his surviving son's callous response, the rabbi reached into his pocket and gave him his own ration.

But years later he admitted that he had finally come to appreciate the true meaning of the adage in Lamentations: "They who are slain with the sword are more worthy than those who are slain from hunger."

The spiral of depravity into which hunger can plunge the human soul is well known to Jewish history. During the three-year Roman siege of Jerusalem from 67 to 70 C.E., hunger and thirst had so maddened the population that some were known to have killed their own for food. As a debilitating civil war raged between zealots and moderates within the city's walls, the citadel's grain stores were set on fire. While the city's military defenders struggled to save what was left, the ensuing riot destroyed any hope of a unified resistance.

From that day forward, the defenders' will to forbear against the enemy collapsed, and Jerusalem's fall became certain.

The world today is, thankfully, not indifferent to starvation. Concerned organizations everywhere devote their experience and resources to the war against hunger. Yet it is rare to find individuals whose love for humanity is so consuming that it will cause them to set their own lives or careers at risk to grapple with the acute moral dilemma presented by hunger.

In Jerusalem, however, I found such a man.

I came across a woman sitting by a wall, her hand out. When I gave her the few coins in my pocket, I noticed that she had a prepared meal, covered in plastic-wrap, lying by her feet. A label on the package indicated that it was from a place called Hazon Yeshaya. I asked her where I could find this place and she pointed to a door a block away. A few moments later, I came face to face with Abraham Israel.

Abraham Israel was a successful businessman in New York when he decided to move his family to Israel. When he arrived, he was alarmed to discover that, in a country with a per-capita income on par with that of Great Britain, there were thousands of citizens who couldn't provide food for their families. Distressed by this, he invested his own money to build soup kitchens in the community. Today he struggles to feed 20,000 people a month on a miniscule budget. But through Hazon Yeshaya, he has saved thousands from destitution.

"To tell you the truth, I don't know why I do it," he told me, sitting on a wooden seat in his spare office. "The hours are long and it is often heartbreaking work. But when I go to sleep at night, I need to know that I have done everything in my power to help others who have not been blessed with my good fortune."

People such as Abraham Israel never ask for recognition. But they should have it. Because they are the guardians who sit by the village gate. They view their own lives through the prism of other people's suffering. They understand how quickly the absence of sustenance can lead to human degradation. And they appreciate, more than many of us, the undeniable link that exists between physical well-being and the moral and spiritual dynamism of the world.

Changing the Question

by Asher Brander

PEDDLERS OF THE ENGLISH language have the good fortune of choosing from among hundreds of thousands of words. Any given idea may be stated in the Latin, Germanic or Saxon tongues. Are you crazy (Scandinavian), lunatic (French), insane (Latin), maniacal (Greek) or just meshuge (Yiddish/Hebrew)? For those who count these sorts of things, there are approximately 825,000 words and counting. Hebrew, on the other hand, is word-poor (with approximately 5,000 biblical roots) and meaning-full. Its paucity of words allows each root to enjoy rich connectivity. A thing – davar – can be an object, an affair, a happening, or a matter; in Hebrew, one word encompasses them all. The great commentator Maharal points out that davar is etymologically linked with dibbur, speech. Everything that happens in the world talks. Nothing in the world is devoid of meaning.

Instead of philosophizing - in Hebrew, Lamah? - which means "Why?" - let us ask Lemah? - "What can I learn from these events?"

The way we respond to difficult or confusing events in life must start with the question of davar: what is it saying? What message can we draw from what has happened?

And there is no shortage of mystery, in life or in Jewish thought. A famous enigmatic Talmudic statement (Tractate Brachot 43b) states: "One should never walk quickly, for a quick gait snatches 1/500th of a person's sight. What is the corrective? Make Kiddush and Havdalah (the symbolic ceremonies that begin and end the Sabbath)."

Got that? Clearly, the Rabbis are driving at something deeper!

Western society functions at a blinding pace. The world is now "24-7". One need never be alone. On any given Tuesday at 3 a.m. in mid-January, the world of TV (100-plus channels), Internet, video stores, 24-hour supermarkets and 7-11 (which no longer closes at 11) beckons. Recreation has replaced reflection. Running has replaced thinking – thus the timeless message of the Talmud: We must all Shabbatize our lives, create an oasis in which to reflect upon their meaning. Not to do so causes existential blindness.

But what shall we reflect upon?

One of the great Talmudic stories (Brachot 7a) relates a discussion between King Hezekiah (720-690 BCE) and the prophet Isaiah. During Hezekiah's illustrious reign, his kingdom becomes a citadel of spirituality. Suddenly he falls ill. The great prophet Isaiah visits.

Isaiah informs Hezekiah that in short order, Hezekiah will die; worse, he will not merit a share in the world to come. Dumbstruck, the great king asks why, and is told that it is his steadfast refusal of all marriage offers and consequent lack of children that angers the Divine throne. Hezekiah responds something like this: "With good reason, for I have seen that my children will be wicked. I have made a practical cost-benefit analysis and spared God the trouble."

Isaiah responds: "In the secrets of God, why do you meddle? What is incumbent upon you to do shall you do!"

Postscript: They live happily ever after. Hezekiah accepts the prophetic rebuke and tells Isaiah he wants to marry the prophet's own daughter (because if his children will be wicked, then Isaiah will be the zayde! [grandfather]). Indeed the shidduch (match) produces terrible children, among them a world-class idolater by the name of Menashe.

So – wasn't Hezekiah correct? Would the world not have been better off without a Menashe?

When Moses demands of God in Exodus Chapter 33, "Show me your ways," God responds: "No one can see My face and live. Stand behind the rock and as I pass, you may see Me from the back. My face, however, you will never be able to see."

"You may see Me from the back" – those once irrational and purposeless events in your life will be clarified retrospectively. "My face, however" – that is, events as they are occurring – you will never understand.

Mortal man does not understand the secrets of God. Thus the Jewish response to the mysterious has always been humility, along with reflection, looking back. But if we never understand, then what is the purpose of our reflection? We return to the Talmud.

Tractate Eiruvin records that for two-and-a-half years a great debate raged between the two preeminent schools of the Mishna, Shammai and Hillel: Was it better for man to have been created or not to have been created? The conclusion: Better not to have been created, but now that we are created, let us reflect carefully upon our deeds.

Our deeds and not God's. Self-reflection makes our life worth living.

And thus a modest proposal: Instead of trying to play God, let us react Divinely.

Instead of philosophizing – in Hebrew, Lamah? – which means "Why?" – let us ask Lemah? – "What can I learn from these events?" Let's change one vowel, keeping the root, and change the direction of our question.

Instead of asking, "Why did I lose my job?" let us wonder: What can I do with this time to make myself a better person?

Instead of asking, "Why is my dear friend (or relative or spouse) so sick?" let us consider: What will I do to help?

Instead of "Why me?" let us think: What from me?

After Sept. 11th, for the first time in my life, the humbled world seemed to stop and self reflect. No NFL, no NBA, no Grammies, no Emmys, no Leno, no Letterman, no commercials.

Everything that happens in the world talks. But now the world is almost back to "normal." Let us hope we are not.

Rabbi Asher Brander leads the Westwood Kehilla in Los Angeles. His last article in OLAM was "Is there Godliness in Evil?"

One of the most mysterious omissions in the Bible comes at the very beginning, as a prelude to the world's first case of murder.

Cain and Abel, the world's first brothers, are out in the field together, and the Torah tells us that "Cain said to his brother Abel... and when they were in the field, Cain set upon his brother Abel and killed him." So we all know that Cain killed Abel, and we know that some sort of conversation or exchange of words between them preceded the murder. What we do not know is what they talked about. The Torah is remarkably silent about what was presumably a pretty powerful exchange, given that these words led to an act of murder. It seems the Torah intentionally left the content and details of this conversation out of the text, so that we could sit and speculate on what type of words would lead to murder. And indeed, Midrash offers three different speculations. One posits that they argued about land and material possessions. A second is that they argued about whose land God's Temple should be built on. A third opinion hypothesizes that Cain and Abel actually had a sister, and that she was the subject of their dispute. So let's think about this: what were the causes of the world's first dispute, which led to the world's first murder? Land, religion and jealousy over a woman.

The Midrash demonstrates the power of the Torah's silence. Had it given us the details, we might never have been able to apply the lessons of this first murder to our own lives as well as the Midrash did for us. Because of the Torah's silence on this matter, the Midrash was able to explore the issue of murder and remind us that whether it's Cain and Abel or any other set of people or nations, the issues that potentially lead to murder apply in every generation, in every language and religion, and around the entire globe. This is one of the divine cases when the Torah's silence speaks more powerfully than its words.

the terror of not knowing

by Yael Haran

WHEN TERROR strikes there is no warning. At this moment and on this day, humanity is divided against itself and millions of innocent citizens glimpse over the brink into a sea of impending disaster. We don't know what the next days, months or years will hold. Another holocaust of the innocent? The loss of whole American cities? We can't see the future that our grandchildren will inherit. Our imagination lurches into the abyss of uncertainty, and returns with incapacitating images of thousands dead from pulmonary anthrax, of hoards of Kurdish children poisoned by cyanide gas, of millions caught in a holocaust of nuclear terror. In the realm of not-knowing, the phantasm is unleashed and can become the chief propaganda of our enemy – that invisible fiend called Terror.

As you read this, America is on nuclear alert and homeland security teams scan for "loose nukes" that could vanquish 100,000 cherished lives in one small atomic mushroom. While we browse the heavens for answers, armies of medical researchers are perfecting a new class of smallpox vaccine. Every day of every month, the world's greatest minds are working on biological sensors, on new classes of antibiotics, on borders impermeable to smuggled uranium. While we sleep, military ambassadors comb the globe for the weapons of mass destruction that could obliterate the free world. We don't know and they don't know when the serial killer called terror will strike next or what will be its face. And this is not a Hollywood movie, it is the terror of not knowing.

Take a deep breath and begin to relax. Any noise you hear while reading this will just cause you to relax more. You are giving yourself this time, and you know that nothing is important to you right now in this moment except the moment itself. We are enduring a revolution. In great ways and small, a sense of uncertainty prevails. In the aftermath of the 9-11 attacks, we have uncovered new resources of strength that we can tap into for their healing power. As families, communities and nations, we have heard the drumbeat of war, and we begin to see how to generate a sense of protection, on all plains: physical, emotional, mental and spiritual.

Let us imagine we are all young Israelis. In the decade since the 1991 Gulf War, when the entire population was drilled in preparedness for non-conventional attack, we learned about terror and how to deal with its chief weapon – surprise, the unknowns of time, place, method and impact. As Israelis, we are pioneers in facing the persistent anxiety this provokes. We are experienced riders of the unpredictable, of revolutions in our national reality, and we know something of how to turn that vulnerability into a dynamic flexibility. It is a fact as hard as a golden stone that Israeli citizens adapt, create, endure and protect one another.

For 20 years, Prof. Moshe Kirshenbaum of the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology has been compiling statistics to advise Israel's home-front command on preparing populations for non-conventional attacks. His findings reveal an oasis of certainties. The family unit, he says, is the best basis for readiness. Where there are families, there are sealed rooms with filters, there are updated gas-masks, battery-powered radios. After the family comes the community. Forward planning as a community relieves individuals from the anxiety of fear and brings preparedness to the greatest number. Above all, Prof. Kirshenbaum is eager to dispel one destructive myth. "People don't panic," he says. "The more they know, the more empowered they feel. The number one need of civilians in a crisis is to do something to help."

The unknown is terrifying. But clear information and empowerment of communities are the antidotes. Information, because we will find that even the most apocalyptic threat has a tangible dimension and can be overcome; community, because where there is compassion, the fearful one within becomes the greatest hero.

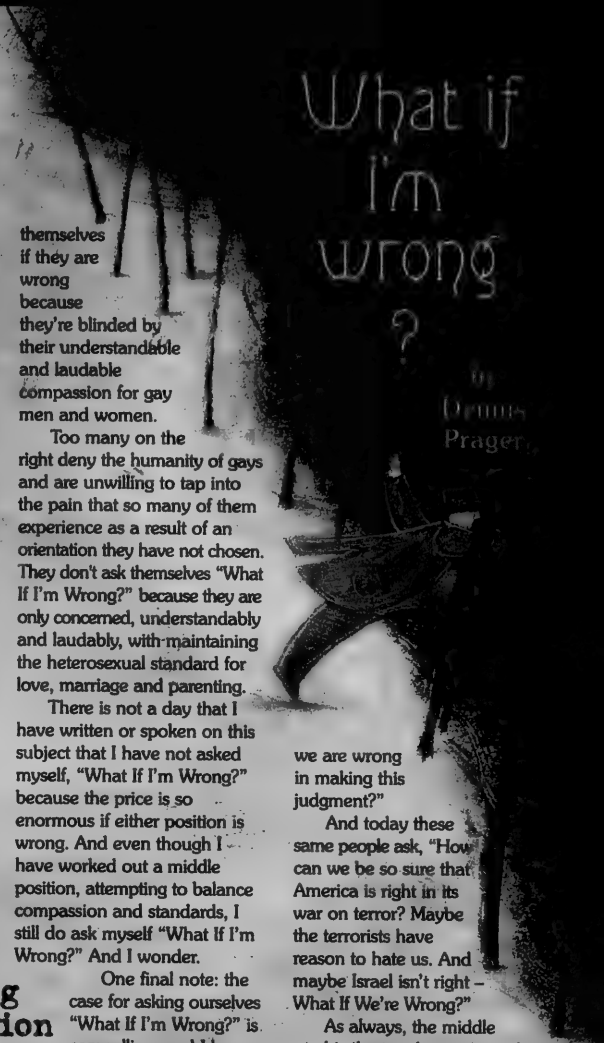
What if I'm wrong?

by Dennis Prager



THE EDITORS have asked me to write an essay on the subject, "What If I'm Wrong?" To people familiar with my work, asking me to write on this subject must seem like asking a blind man to write about colors. I fully acknowledge that I have many firm beliefs and articulate them with little ambivalence.

So it may come as a surprise to learn that I do always ask myself, "What If I'm Wrong?"

I do so for a number of reasons.

First, it is impossible to maintain any level of intellectual honesty if you don't regularly ask yourself this question.

Second, repeatedly asking yourself this question prevents your beliefs from becoming irrational dogma maintained not because the belief is true, but because it keeps you comfortable.

Third, when you ask yourself this question and reaffirm your original belief, you do so with more vitality and with better arguments than before.

Fourth, it is very rare that opposing views are entirely wrong. The moment you acknowledge this, you have no choice but to ask yourself whether you may be wrong. And when you do, you can do one of three things: change your mind entirely, modify your position to incorporate the truths of the opposing position, or reaffirm your original belief with greater vigor, now that you have honestly encountered the possibility that the opposing view may be right.

For these reasons, I always ask myself, "What If I'm Wrong?"

Let me offer two particularly significant examples:

I have devoted decades to arguing for God's existence in largely secular forums such as radio, television, universities and in print. Yet I have often asked myself "What If I'm Wrong?" For the truth is that while I am as close to certain about God's existence as one can be about anything that is not empirically provable, I constantly work at maintaining my faith. Moreover, while I consider the arguments of atheists and agnostics wrong, they are sometimes quite intelligent. And by incorporating them, my ability to argue for faith in God has greatly increased.

But what if I'm wrong about the existence of God?

Frankly, if there were no God, I would become a depressed person. This is not hyperbole. The consequences of there not being a God (or of not believing that there is one, which is the same thing in terms of the consequences) make happiness virtually impossible for anyone sensitive to human suffering. There is so much evil and so much unjust suffering in the world that the thought that there is no God and therefore no ultimate justice, and nothing out there that cares about the tortured souls of this world, is too painful to ponder.

The second example is what I believe to be the single most complex question of our time, that of homosexuality.

> "Repeatedly asking yourself this question prevents your beliefs from becoming irrational dogma, maintained not because the belief is true, but because it keeps you comfortable."

Too few people, it seems to me, ask themselves, "What If I'm Wrong?"

Too many on the left are willing to demolish millennia of standards – such as the definition of marriage and the need to give children whenever possible the chance of having a mother and father. They don't ask themselves if they are wrong because they're blinded by their understandable and laudable compassion for gay men and women.

Too many on the right deny the humanity of gays and are unwilling to tap into the pain that so many of them experience as a result of an orientation they have not chosen. They don't ask themselves "What If I'm Wrong?" because they are only concerned, understandably and laudably, with maintaining the heterosexual standard for love, marriage and parenting.

There is not a day that I have written or spoken on this subject that I have not asked myself, "What If I'm Wrong?" because the price is so enormous if either position is wrong. And even though I have worked out a middle position, attempting to balance compassion and standards, I still do ask myself "What If I'm Wrong?" And I wonder.

One final note: the case for asking ourselves "What If I'm Wrong?" is compelling, and I hope I have articulated that case here. But just as there are grave dangers in never asking this question, there is an equally grave danger that always asking the question can lead to moral paralysis.

Indeed, that is a great danger in the West today (just as a lack of self-questioning is the frightening danger emanating from the Islamic world today). Too many people in the West have succumbed to a moral paralysis because of this question. "Who are we to call the Soviet Union an 'evil empire'"? they asked. "What if we are wrong in making this judgment?"

And today these same people ask, "How can we be so sure that America is right in its war on terror? Maybe the terrorists have reason to hate us. And maybe Israel isn't right – What If We're Wrong?"

As always, the middle road is the toughest one to travel on. We do have to always ask ourselves, "What If I'm Wrong?" That helps keep us from falling into fanaticism and irrationality. But if we were to let that question prevent us from making moral decisions and fighting the good fight, well, that would be wrong.

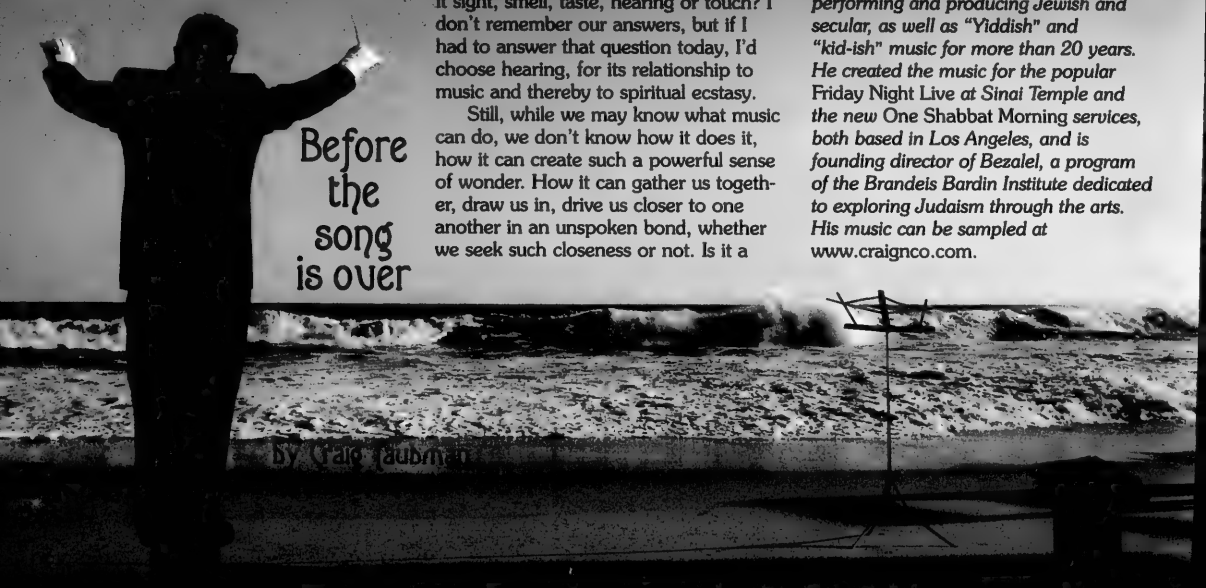
Before the song is over



by Craig Taubman

THE TASK THE EDITOR gave me sounded simple: "Tell us about the mystery of music, in 750 words or less."

I told her that if I could describe music with words, there would be no need for music. Music is like a kiss, or the embrace of a parent or a child: It is one thing to experience and another thing to describe. I sat down with my laptop in search of words. I found many words but unfortunately very little to say.

An idea came to me. I called the editor and asked her if, in lieu of an essay, it would be possible to insert a CD of music into every copy of OLAM. Certainly that would enable the reader to "hear the music," and I could definitely do it in 750 words or less. My idea was hit with a sudden burst of indifference. I went back to my laptop.

How can we explain music? In music, I find a beauty that cannot be expressed verbally or dissected intellectually. Music is so pure, so different from speech or text. The Hasidim know this perhaps better than most. While they are well versed in Torah and other scholarly texts, it is often through song that they reach levels of spiritual ecstasy. Traditional Hasidic songs are often inspired by and rooted in words, but they evolve into melodies that are wordless. These melodies, or niggunim, have tremendous emotional and spiritual power.

A great teacher of mine from the 18th century, Rebbe Nachman of Breslov, put it quite poetically when he said, "Come here, I will show you a new way to the Creator – not through speech, but through song! Let us sing and Heaven will understand us." It is nothing that we can understand, but rather that Heaven will understand us!

I'm fortunate enough to make my living in music. Sometimes I am quite pleased with the writing that I've done. Often it's just a clever rhyme, or a neatly fitting lyric that gives me a measure of satisfaction. This I understand, but there are also holy melodies, sacred melodies that sing to me from a place deep in my soul. These fill me with wonder and awe. I don't understand them.

I discover these melodies as if by chance, but I think it is no accident that they reveal themselves to me. When writing them I feel years of history and culture flowing through me. When I sing them over and over, they dance round and round, much like the Hasidim, and take me to new levels. I find myself going higher and higher and at the same time deeper and deeper, merging with the moment and, it seems, everything around me.

I remember how my family would often sit around the Shabbat table when I was a child and argue over which of our senses was the most important. Was it sight, smell, taste, hearing or touch? I don't remember our answers, but if I had to answer that question today, I'd choose hearing, for its relationship to music and thereby to spiritual ecstasy.

Still, while we may know what music can do, we don't know how it does it, how it can create such a powerful sense of wonder. How it can gather us together, draw us in, drive us closer to one another in an unspoken bond, whether we seek such closeness or not. Is it a coincidence that God, the Holy One, placed our voice boxes right between our minds and our hearts? Or is this a glorious, deliberate design, making our voices a fulcrum to help us balance our feelings and our world?

We may be able to describe the particular notes, measure the vibrations and count out the rhythms in miniscule detail. But we never really know how they will touch us or others. Every time we sing, every time there is music and song, the opportunity changes and we too can be changed. As we search for new ways to attract and retain Jewish souls, and to build bridges among us, perhaps sweet song can show us the way.

Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel said: "Mankind will not perish for want of information, but only for want of appreciation. The beginning of our happiness lies in the understanding that life without wonder is not worth living."

What a gift, how perfect: music, one of the great joys in life, which we can never really understand but only enjoy!

So, for just a moment, close the magazine.... remember a song.... close your eyes and open your heart.... let yourself wander in wonder.... and open yourself to the mystery, before the song is over.

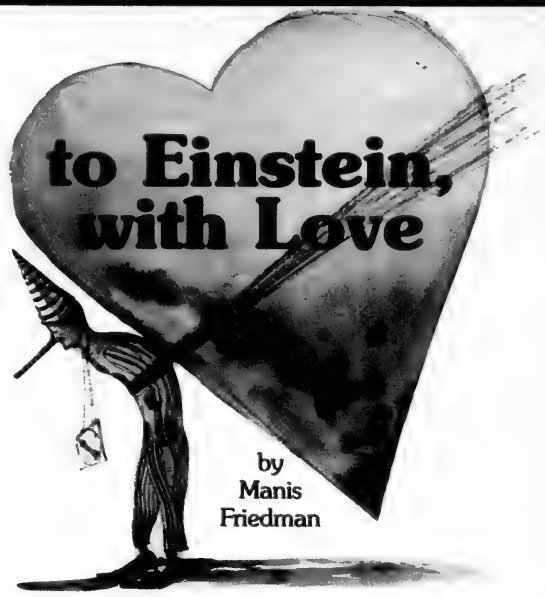
to Einstein, with Love



by Manis Friedman

AN ENCOUNTER WITH THE unknowable is not only inevitable, it is also ennobling. What we know makes us intelligent. What we don't know makes us nicer people. Let's understand this:

"To You silence is praise, G-d in Zion, and to You shall the vow be paid. You hear our prayer – to You shall all flesh be brought." (Psalm 65)

Praise creates a bond of closeness between the praiser and the one being praised. As in the ladder of prayer that stands on earth and reaches into heaven connecting the worshipper to G-d through the praises in prayer, the very description of that which is G-dly and noble raises the worshipper out of his workday existence; he transcends it. He is nobler.

"To You silence is praise" means that our connection to You (G-d Himself) comes about through silence. What then is this silence that is capable of connecting man with the ein-sof, the infinite light?

A thinking person knows that the realm of knowledge comprises the known and the unknown. The thinking person takes great pleasure in understanding a subject clearly, thoroughly and conclusively.

When he encounters something unknowable he does not abandon the subject, he studies it through a process of elimination. He cannot understand infinity for he does not know what it is, but he will be very clear as to what it is not. He will know exactly what it is about infinity that is inexplicable and what exactly makes it so.

Albert Einstein, contemplating his finite universe, is moored to a cosmic religious experience – "the most beautiful, profound emotion is the sensation of the mystical. He to whom this emotion is a stranger, who cannot wonder in rapt awe, is as good as dead." This he describes as "the truest religious experience."

But the thinking person does not stop there. The quest continues. For he knows that understanding must yield to what is above it, namely gehfil – insight that results from understanding but also transcends it. Logic may be captured in words, gehfil cannot be. Gehfil is neither strengthened by evidence nor weakened by contradictions.

The great physicist Max Planck writes, "Science is the unending endeavor towards an aim which the poetic intuition may apprehend but which the intellect can never grasp."

Every conclusion reached in the realm of knowledge is debatable. All logic can and will eventually be replaced by greater logic. The thinking person wants to arrive at an immutable truth or an undeniable reality. This takes him beyond the realm of knowledge into the world of hergesh, a gehfil or recognition of truth. A place in our soul where the ring of truth is apprehended – "poetic intuition."

This hergesh-truth, once attained, cannot be challenged by arguments or logic. It is immutable.

Thus great minds speak of the humbling effects of awe and wonderment. Those who most appreciate the magnitude of creation, tiny specks of protoplasm dwarfed by a universe that is itself a tiny speck of matter in an infinite void, lift their eyes to heaven and wonder, "Who created all this?"

"Rapt awe," "wonderment" – this much Mr. Einstein experienced.

The beautiful mystery is in the transition moment when the mind goes from logic to hergesh. When the mind reaches the outer limits of the knowable it is stunned into silence. It enters a place in our soul where there is no 'noise' – all desires, urges, needs, fears, and opinions are still. Everything that makes a person who and what he is cannot enter this place in the soul and so it is silent.

"Mr. Einstein, don't stop at wonderment. Go for the hergesh!"

Dear, Mr. Einstein: A true religious experience is a relationship with the Divine. It is not enough to marvel at your wife's beauty or stand in awe of her unconditional devotion and wonder at the sweetness that turns even a great brain to mush. If your wife says, "I'm hungry," you can't say, "Shhhhh, I'm in awe. I'm marveling. I'm adoring you." And when she says, "But I'd really like something to eat," you can't say, "I love you." You must move from the realm of observation into the realm of hergesh, where her hunger is real, undeniable, and you must respond to her reality.

The silent place in the soul is not passive. The refined mind appreciates the subtle stirrings within that silence: a stillness, a yearning, a hopefulness. In the stillness is a yearning to recognize the truth. The yearning awakens a hopefulness. He waits and yearns, waits and hopes, for a hergesh.

This part of the soul is called tzion, a marker or sign. A marker exists not for itself but to indicate the existence of another. This part of the soul is silent of all self-need and exists only to recognize the needs of another.

Mr. Einstein, don't stop at wonderment. Go for the hergesh! You've discovered the Creator, now see Him as He is. What does He want with creation? What are His needs? What can you do for Him? And feel your wife's needs. Serve her the way she needs to be served.

Tzion is the G-dliness of the soul. "G-d in Tzion." And in that place we carry a vow. The vow we made before birth – "Be righteous and be not sinful." It is the vow we made at Sinai. "We will do and we will hear." In that place we know that "To you our vow will be paid." A vow must be fulfilled. Inevitably, all vows will be paid. So, "All flesh will come before You." For He desires for the mitzvah to be performed in the flesh. From the awe and wonderment we move to hergesh, feel His need, and put on the tefillin, eat the matzoh, immerse in the mikvah....

Mr. Einstein! The Creator, before Whom you are humbled in awe, created the universe, you and your awe. Shouldn't you yearn to know Him? Follow the path to hergesh into His reality. Hear your wife the way she sounds in that place of silence. Fulfill your vow. Go into the stillness and serve her the way she needs to be served. In simple language, Mr. Einstein, go over and hug her.

Rabbi Manis Friedman is a world-renowned speaker and author of Doesn't Anyone Blush Any More? The insight into the silence of the soul is based on Likkutei Dibburim, an anthology of talks by Rabbi Y.Y. Schneerson, father-in-law of the late Lubavitcher Rebbe.

What about Mashiach?

Who will it be? When will he be here? Let's see what the great Maimonides (1135-1204) had to say about it in his Mishnah Torah, Laws of Kings, Chapter 12, Law 2:

"All these matters concerning the Messianic times cannot be known by man until they actually occur, for they are mysterious and undefined in the words of the prophets. Even the sages have no clear established tradition regarding these matters beyond what is implied by these verses. Hence, there is a divergence of opinion among them. In any case, neither the sequence of these events nor their precise details are among the fundamental principles of faith. One should not occupy himself at length with aggadoth and midrashim that deal with these and similar matters, nor should he deem them of prime importance, for they bring one to neither the awe nor the love of God."

"We cannot know"

a LETTER to the EDITOR

Our last issue, "Jerusalem In Living Color," generated a tremendous number of responses. Here is one of them, from the Speaker of the Israeli Parliament, Avraham Burg, which coincidentally fits the searching theme of this issue.

My name is Avraham. The name of the founder of the Jewish nation. I was born 47 years ago in the city that is closest to the heavens. I was born in the capital city of God on High: Jerusalem.

My city, Jerusalem, is not a simple city. It is a city whose heart beats with the hearts of billions of believers every day of the year. It is the city whose fate will be decided soon.

Israel has gone to considerable lengths in the pursuit of peace. Because it is clear to all of us that where there is no peace, innocent people die.

We, the Israelis, await the compromise that will be the Palestinians' response. And from this OLAM forum I call to them, in the name of all Israel: Do not say no! This is no time for stubbornness! Think of the history, think of the children of the peoples of the region, and say yes to compromise. Do not wait for absolute peace because war will come first. Do not wait for the next opportunity, for it may never come.

I hope that the entire world will join me in my prayers for peace – that the days of suffering and war in our region have ended – and in the hope that innocent people will no longer perish in the battlefields.

I was born in this city, this beautiful and tortured city. I know and respect its many faithful and its many faiths.

I would be the last to dismiss or belittle the holiness of this city to the followers of the monotheistic religions that sprang forth from Judaism. I will defend to my dying breath the rights and religious freedom of all those who love Jerusalem. The Children of Abraham, the believers in Jesus Christ, and the followers of Allah, the merciful and compassionate, and Mohammed his Prophet (Rasul Allah).

At the same time, I will demand no less respect for the holiness of Jerusalem from the millions of Jews who cast their eyes to her, who died in their quest for her over the three thousand years of Jewish civilization.

Only a formula for peace that is built on a foundation of "respect for the sacred" will enable all of us to dwell for generations as respected citizens in the city of God.

Jerusalem of peace, in accordance with Israel's position, will not only be the capital of Israel, the only Jewish state in the world, but will become the world capital of democracy.

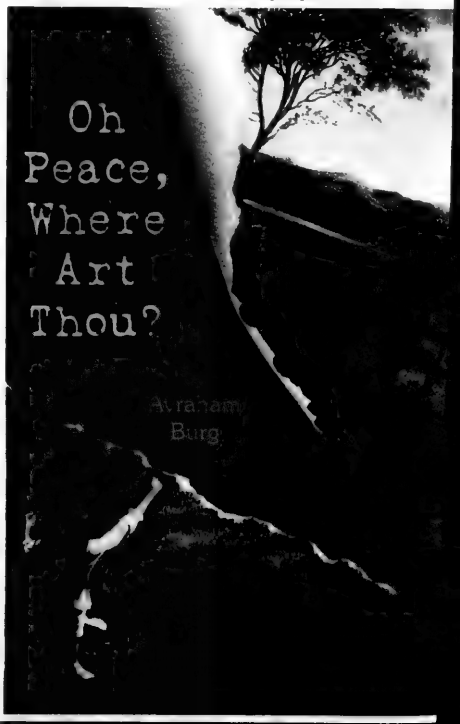
A city of peace and understanding, a city whose sovereignty belongs to God, but whose existence depends on understanding, mercy and love between men and women – in the vision of God.

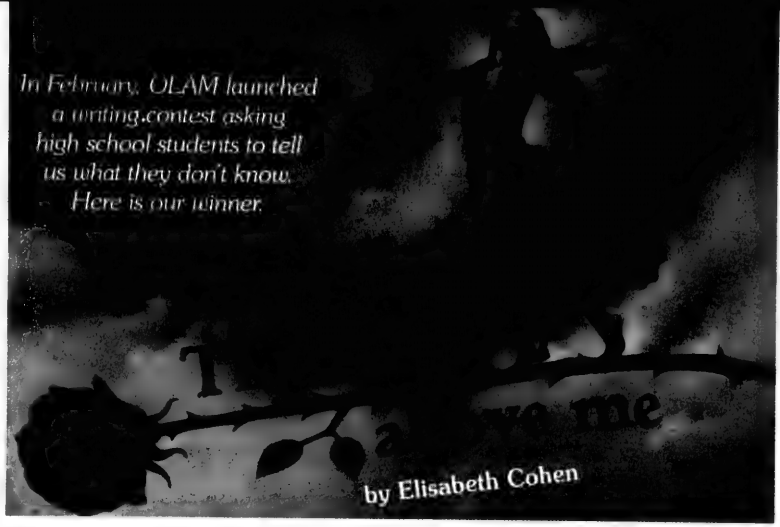
I would like to invite all of you to the Holy City. I would like to extend a hand of peace to all those who have not yet joined the circle of peace in the Middle East.

I await the day that the leader of Iran, the President of Syria, the President of Iraq, the President of Libya and the entire Islamic world come to Jerusalem in peace and in the joy of the faithful.

What better place than Jerusalem, the cradle of Western civilization, to be the city where our nations shall begin the dialogue.

For this is the prophetic vision of the Jewish people for all times: "My House shall be called a House of Worship for all peoples."





In February, OLAM launched a writing contest asking high school students to tell us what they don't know. Here is our winner.

I Know Me

by Elisabeth Cohen

EVER SINCE the Renaissance, humankind has been out to quantify, understand, and thus surpass nature. To master natural laws limiting our motion and our energy, and so no longer fear them. With nearly ceaseless activity, higher and higher again and yet higher and still higher than that... only in the 20th century, in the wake of so much genocide and radioactive ash, did we learn to fear ourselves as we once feared nature, and to accept the possibility of human self-limitation. We gave up perpetual motion along with faster-than-light travel and immortality. Yet in an ultimate irony, in our own age, having given up on the invention of a perpetual motion machine, we have created one by accident. It sprang up spontaneously, out of that other less-regarded by-product of devastating world war ... pain.

This is Human pain, which can self-perpetuate indefinitely once it reaches a critical point in a terrifying chain reaction. Pain which begets violence, which begets pain, which begets violence. People are distorted by pain. They are radicalized. Pain and reaction to pain takes over other human functions; it stands in lieu of moral authority, in lieu of reason. We can – and do, and always will – continue ruminating upon the disastrous state of the world, but it is hardly constructive. The question, then, is much harder, because it moves a step away from easy despair and towards assumption of responsibility. So then how can we – as individuals, as societies, as a human race – learn to stop hurting one another? In what way can we break the escalating cycles of victimization, self-fueled by an experience of pain that transcends the rational?

How does one stop a perpetual motion machine?

How are we advised to deal with pain? Our society is full of answers: "Put it behind you." "Don't fight it – ride it out." "You have to get help to accept what happened." The idea is that humans have the power, through affirmative action, through muckraking exposes, through a peace process, through hundreds of self-help books, to "deal" with pain such that it will no longer have to be dealt with. Is the human memory so short? Does remembered agony, like the poet Langston Hughes' dream deferred, "dry up like a raisin in the sun" until it is nothing? And do we really want to live in a world where after a sin is atoned for it disappears? I think restitution should be made, however possible, to those who have been victimized – but I am profoundly disturbed by the proposition that there are easy solutions to human suffering.

"Yet in an ultimate irony, having given up on the invention of a perpetual motion machine, we have created one by accident: pain."

"Does it explode?" the poet asks. The simplest reaction to pain is to strike back. Agony leaves the tightness of the well-conducted soul. It flows freely, through the hand and into the trigger. It is transmuted from a nightmare turned inward and becomes a nightmare shared, a nightmare made real in the world and thus liberating the lonely imagination. At least for a moment, if feels good to lash out. It feels right. Except that the nightmares don't go away. They enter into the tight places of those hurt; they enter into the nightmares of children who once believed in a safe world. They withdraw again into the victim-turned-killer, undiminished, seeking once again their outlet. And the nightmares grow, and as the world goes on, so too does the pain. The mechanism is simple, and it is chilling. And the worst part is that it is understandable. It is satisfying, if only for a moment. Scratching a mosquito bite makes it worse in the end; knowing this doesn't stop anybody from scratching. Taking charge and denying responsibility – what a temptation.

Jews lived for two thousand years in a situation where violent response to pain was impossible. What did they do? Perhaps they internalized it, managed to shoulder the burden quietly, to live the role of the victim who can't fight back. Strength or weakness – who can say? And now that we have our own state, what can we take from that exile? What strategies do we dismiss as crippling? Which can we adapt to the current crisis? A. B. Yehoshua said, when I met him as a member of a student group traveling in Israel, that the most fundamental truth of the Arab-Israeli conflict is that these two peoples will live side by side forever. Forever, with everlasting memories of the pain we give and receive today ricocheting from generation to generation.

I am 17 years old. I live in the United States, which is surely as safe as anywhere, despite everything. The roaring of these winds is above my head, for the most part. I do not suffer greatly. But I do care. And I yearn to understand. And when I think I do understand a little, I see myself no closer to understanding. I look into a future that I cannot see, a future that should be new and exciting for a young woman about to venture out into the world. And when I look as myself, it is. When I look as part of a larger and more frightening world that somehow must take responsibility for itself, as a small cog in a vast perpetual motion machine, I shudder.

Elisabeth Cohen is a senior at Milken Community High School in Los Angeles. Last summer she traveled to Israel as a Bronfman Youth Fellow, to which she credits many of the insights of this article.

Got questions? So do we, a new one every week! Here's our hit parade:

1. What does it mean to have higher consciousness?
2. Do men and women marry for the same reasons?
3. Do you fear changes in life or embrace them?
4. Can you name a physical location or a time in your life where you feel the most spirituality?
5. Who do you consider to be your spiritual leader, and can you tell us why?
6. In your conception of God, does God need help?
7. What do you consider a spiritual gift?
8. Is our spirituality affected by the environment in which we live?
9. What makes music spiritual?
10. What is your spiritual resolution for 2002?
11. Is destruction part of God's creation?
12. Do you believe in miracles? If so, what kind?
13. Does your life reflect your beliefs?
14. Is there ever a justification for hate?
15. What does Passover mean to you?

Legislators return from Israel

Record number on CIC mission

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

A record number of Canadian members of Parliament and senators returned from a mission to Israel last week with a better appreciation of the country's plight, says the trip's organizer, the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC).

"I don't think they feel they went on a mission. I think they feel they're now on a mission," said CIC national executive director Shimon Fogel, who took an unprecedented 22 MPs and five senators on a trip to Israel from April 26 to 29.

Normally, the CIC's annual parliamentary mission takes eight to 10 MPs to Israel, and in the summer, when the House of Commons is in recess.

This time, the House was in session and the CIC had to secure the approval of party whips to allow the parliamentarians to attend.

"It was a challenge. It was quite an undertaking," said Fogel. "But people should understand the extent to which Parliament accommodated us."

The CIC didn't need to advertise the trip too much, either, as lawmakers came forward of their own accord. "Word spread quickly," said Fogel. "We didn't have to recruit anyone."

In fact, it was the largest single Canadian parliamentary mission anywhere, he noted. And the delegation was warmly received everywhere in Israel. "There was a palpable appreciation for their presence."

Participants included two Jewish MPs (Jacques Saada and Anita Neville), two Jewish senators (Jack Austin and Richard Kroft) and at least two MPs with large Jewish constituencies.

The jam-packed itinerary included meetings with Israeli President Moshe Katsav and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, military and security briefings, and meetings with Knesset members and academics on both sides of the ongoing conflict.

Exclusive interview

TORONTO — Even in these times of intense conflict, His Royal Highness Prince Firas bin Raad of Jordan believes that peace in the Middle East is attainable.

In an exclusive interview with The CJN, the Harvard-educated prince focused on the importance of dialogue at all levels in changing the psychology of the conflict and developing an ethic of peace.

Accompanied by Her Royal Highness Princess Dana and their nine-month-old daughter, Her Royal Highness Princess Safa, Firas was here recently as the Canada International Scientific Exchange Program's (CISEPO) visiting professor for peace.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Eggleton's Letter

OTTAWA — Defence minister Art Eggleton has condemned anti-Jewish attacks "in the strongest of terms." In a recent letter to Keith Landy, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, Eggleton said he was "outraged" to hear of anti-Semitic attacks in Toronto. "I want to say to you unequivocally that I stand with the Jewish community at this difficult time," he wrote.

ISRAEL

Jews Arrested

JERUSALEM — Two Israeli Jews were arrested last week on charges of planning attacks on Arabs in eastern Jerusalem. A Jerusalem court accepted a request by the domestic security service and refused to allow the two to meet with their lawyer, citing the sensitivity of the case. The court has barred publication of any further details about the case.

Poppy Field

JERUSALEM — Israeli police have discovered a vast field of opium-producing poppies in the centre of the country. Investigators speculated the field had potential to produce opium worth hundreds of thousands of dollars. Police are trying to locate those who planted the field.

WORLD

Shul Attack in U.K.

LONDON — Vandals attacked a London-area synagogue late last month. After forcing their way into the synagogue in Finsbury Park, the vandals defiled holy books, splattered paint on the Aron Kodesh, threw prayer shawls and skull caps on the floor, and trampled an Israeli flag. They also daubed a swastika and smashed windows.

...and in Russia

MOSCOW — A wave of synagogue vandalism has swept across Russia. On April 6, a Star of David and a swastika were scratched onto the door of a synagogue in Orenburg. A few days later, vandals painted the words "Throw Israel into the sea," along with a swastika, on the walls of the local Jewish welfare centre. On April 12, the words "Jews go home" were found at a Jewish centre in the city of Yoshkar-Ola. On April 14, the windows of the Rostov synagogue were broken. A week later, the words "Death to the Jews" and a swastika were scrawled on the walls of the synagogue.

...and in Germany

BERLIN — A Molotov cocktail was thrown onto the lawn of the Frankeluefer Synagogue in Berlin's Kreuzberg district last week. The fire was doused and damage was minimal. Police reported no leads.

Kids Responsible

BRATISLAVA — Three schoolchildren have been held responsible for one of the worst desecrations of a Slovak Jewish cemetery since the Holocaust. Up to 135 gravestones were damaged or destroyed in the attack on the cemetery in the city of Kosice last month. Authorities said three children, aged between 11 and 13, damaged the gravestones because they were looking for gold underneath, adding that they were too young to be prosecuted.

Farrakhan Ban

LONDON — Britain's Court of Appeal has upheld the government's right to bar Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan from the country. The court said the ban was based on reasonable fears that Farrakhan's "notorious opinions" were a threat to public order. The court also ruled that Farrakhan cannot appeal the decision to the House of Lords, Britain's highest court.

Aliyah Down

MOSCOW — Immigration to Israel from the former Soviet Union is down 50 per cent this year. More than 5,200 new immigrants arrived in Israel from the former Soviet Union in the first four months of this year, a drop of nearly 50 per cent from the same period in 2001.

Jews Weigh Israel

RANGOON — The remnant of Myanmar's once-thriving Jewish community is considering leaving for Israel. Only 20 Jews from eight families remain in the nation once known as Burma, and many of them are planning to leave for Israel, Jewish leader Moses Samuels told Reuters.

Online Mameloshen

NEW YORK — A digital library of Yiddish books is now available on the Internet. Users can purchase some 12,000 books in the Steven Spielberg Digital Yiddish Library, which has been created by the National Yiddish Book Centre. The library is at www.yiddishbooks.org.

Witness Silent on Bombing Attack

BUENOS AIRES — A key witness in the trial of 20 people accused of helping to bomb Buenos Aires' main Jewish community centre has refused to answer a key question.

Carlos Alberto Telleldin, a used car dealer, is accused of supplying the van used to carry explosives in the 1994 attack, which killed 85 people and wounded 300.

Testifying late last month, Telleldin refused to say who bought the van.

"I am not going to talk about that," he told the packed courthouse.

"I never thought the van was going to be used for a terrorist attack," he said.

Prosecutors had anxiously awaited Telleldin's testimony to see if he would implicate former police officers thought to have been involved in the attack.

Muslim cleric says intifadah contrary to Islam

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — There is no basis in Islam for anti-Zionism and the current intifadah is, in fact, contrary to Islamic law, says an outspoken Italian Muslim scholar, who publicly condemns the Palestinian Authority and its chairman Yasser Arafat for distorting the teachings of Islam for their own purposes.

During his recent visit to Canada, Sheikh Abdul Hadi Palazzi said in an interview with The CJN that the Qu'uran recognizes the Land of Israel as the heritage of the Jews and that the modern State of Israel is the fulfillment of the prophecy that, before the Last Judgment, the Jewish people will return to dwell there.

Those who rise up against Israel in the name of Islam are committing "fitnah," meaning apostasy and sedition, Palazzi said, and those who encourage the ignorant to do so are "terrorist criminals."

He is a harsh critic of Palestinian suicide bombers and what he sees as the sacrifice of children in the current intifadah. No "paradise" awaits those who die this way, Palazzi said. "Islam forbids suicide for any reason."

He accuses "pseudo-Islamic" organizations, like Hamas, of cruelly exploiting the impoverished in refugee camps. "Unfortunately, it is true that their only opportunity for a better future lies in sacrificing their children as suicide bombers, for which they will be paid by these organizations."

The only justification for a Muslim to rebel against the government he or she lives under is if that authority prevents them from abiding by the laws and practices of Islam. That is definitely not the case with regard to Israel and Arabs under its jurisdiction, said Palazzi, who is emphatic that Muslims actually have more freedom in Israel than they do in many Arab states.

Palazzi says there is no need for a Palestinian state and that a nationality known as "Palestinian" never existed before 1967.

"A Palestinian state is inconceivable... It would simply be a time bomb under Israel, Jordan and the whole Middle East," he said. "In two to five years, it would become a basis for terrorism like Afghanistan under the Taliban."

Palazzi thinks the only "realistic" solution is to give the Arabs in the West Bank and Gaza autonomous administration, similar to that now extended to the Tyrolean region of northern Italy, where German is the official language. But first the PLO, Hamas and other terrorist groups should be expelled from the area and "not one weapon" should be allowed to remain.

"There are already two 'Palestinian' states: Israel and Jordan. What is being suggested is a third Palestinian state," Palazzi said.

He also dismisses the notion that Jerusalem, because it is the traditional site of Mohammed's ascension to heaven, must be the Palestinian capital. "A city's religious status is not necessary connected to its political role... Mecca, for example,

The Old Man

From the editor's desk

He was called the Old Man, even when he was not very old. Except in his later years, the term never really referred to his age. Rather, it was a reference to his stature as the wise, commanding leader of the Jews of Palestine from the 1930s to 1948 and then, after May 14, 1948, of the State of Israel.

David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister, was one of the last century's rare individuals, a man in whom clarity of thought, depth of intellect, single-mindedness of purpose, courage of conviction and wide, trans-generational, historical perspective merged into rock-hard resolution. More than any other man, he embodied the struggle for the rebirth of the ancient Jewish homeland into a modern, sovereign state for the stateless Jewish people.

As it was my good fortune to be in Jerusalem recently to celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut, it seemed only appropriate to visit the Old Man's home in Sdeh Boker, a kibbutz in the Negev Desert.

In 1953, Ben-Gurion somewhat tempestuously, as was his occasional manner, left the government and moved to the Negev Desert to join a group of young pioneers who, some months before, had founded a kibbutz called The Cowboy's (or Rancher's) Field – Sdeh Boker.

But by then he was already 67 years old and no longer cut out for punching cows or herding sheep. Thus, 14 months later, in 1955, he ended his retirement and returned to more familiar, more suitable chores in government in Jerusalem as minister of defence and then, again, as prime minister.

This tour of duty in Jerusalem would last eight years. In 1963, the Old Man resigned from the government, again rather abruptly, and returned to his modest home on the kibbutz where he would live the rest of his days, writing, greeting visitors, walking contemplatively if slowly, under the sparkling sky of the cool desert evenings.

Ben-Gurion's home, preserved in its original modesty and simplicity, is now a national museum in which some of the Old Man's personal belongings are displayed and part of his life story is recounted.

Being inside the Old Man's home, seeing some of the very human, very ordinary minutiae of his daily routines, seeing the volumes upon volumes of eclectic reading material and imagining his movement from room to room, gave this visitor a shiver of goosebumps.

Ben-Gurion's grave is a short drive away from his home. Alongside that of his wife Paula, who predeceased him by five years, it forms a lookout onto the hauntingly beautiful Wilderness of Zin. It is there, as recorded in the Torah, that our ancient forebears wandered for 40 years, changing their essence, like metal in a hot forge, from a rabble of slaves into a structured, law-abiding, free people.

The view from the graves is picturesque beyond description, southward onto a valley of beige, brown, grey and gold mesas of crusted sand, seemingly scythed uniformly across their tops by the eroding force of knife-edged winds.

As I sat on the smooth rock wall of the promontory, casting my gaze far into the shimmering horizon, a breeze curled in from the west, between, around and over the flat-topped, rocky plateaus almost whispering its velocity and other desert secrets to my attentive ear.

The scene was simply breathtaking.

It was the day after Yom Ha'atzmaut. A feeling of deep personal gratitude and privilege overwhelmed me that I was looking at that sight at that moment, part of a people whose inheritance and responsibilities – born in the wind, rock and fire of this Wilderness and proudly passed down through the ages - have been so rich and so life-sustaining.

"After thousands of years of wandering and sufferings all over the world," the Old Man wrote in Sdeh Boker, "the Jews have begun a national renaissance in their Homeland. They will not relinquish their profound historic belief in a fusing of national redemption with the redemption of all mankind. Their national movement will not be shorn of its universal implications. In the State of Israel, there is no distinction between the Jew and the human being. The moral values of our prophets – truth and justice, human fraternity and compassion – are based on our belief that man was created in the image of God; not a white man or a black man or a yellow man, but man in the image of the father of all men. This concept is eternal, all-encompassing, having neither beginning nor end, neither body nor form. The story of the creation of man in the image of God is the foundation of the belief in the fraternity and equality of all peoples, revealed by the prophets of Israel to all mankind."

Some 40 years after he wrote those words and 54 years after he helped launch the State of Israel, the "national renaissance" and the "fusing of national redemption with the redemption of all mankind," have not yet been realized.

That they have not been is disappointing but not surprising given that the Jewish state has had to fight and must still fight for its survival every day it is alive. But how different things might have been, I thought, if the leader of the Palestinian Authority would also have been the Old Man of his people rather than simply the deceiving, hate-filled old man he is.

CALLING FOR ISRAEL:
A week of telethons for UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003 has helped to raise around $9 million designated for social services in Israel. Telethon volunteers, who called from April 28-May 2, contacted nearly 8,000 homes. The telethons are a key component of Israel Emergency Campaign 2003, which began a month ago, four months ahead of schedule, because of the severe crisis faced by Israel after 20 months of Palestinian terror. One of the most active telethon volunteers was Faye Gold, an 80-year-old veteran of many UJA telethons. "I was so worried about what was happening with Israel, and I wanted to help, and this is one of the best ways to do that."

Use of menorah symbol fought in the courts

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Lawyers for Canadian Jewish Congress and Chosen People Ministries (CPM) squared off last week in court in a battle over who can use an ancient and potent symbol of the Jewish people.

Appearing in Federal Court here on April 29, Congress sought a judicial review of the government's earlier approval of CPM's request to register a stylized menorah as a protected official mark, which would allow the Jews for Jesus-type group to use the symbol on all its services and wares, and, potentially, prevent other organizations from doing so.

Congress says the government-sanctioned use of the menorah by a missionary group whose followers accept Jesus as the Jewish messiah would be "scandalous and immoral" and cheapen the symbol's meaning.

CJC lawyers Ben Zarnett and Richard Naiberg argued that the seven-branched menorah "is among the most common and significant symbols in Judaism. It is distinctly Jewish, and holds the same significance for Jews as the cross does for Christians."

CPM, they told the court, "is for born-again Christians whose statement of doctrine is that you must accept the Holy Trinity and the deity of Jesus Christ."

The group's objective "is to spread the gospel of Jesus Christ to Jewish people in America and elsewhere" and "to persuade Jews to accept Jesus Christ." This, the CJC lawyers argued, "is contrary to the views of Judaism and to the overwhelming majority of Jews."

The menorah, they said, is "synonymous with the Jewish people." It is used by dozens of synagogues, Jewish schools and organizations, and is the official state emblem of Israel.

But CPM lawyer Mervyn White said the semi-circular, modern-looking menorah his client has registered is "highly distinctive" and "in no way" would be confused with other menorahs.

He said CPM sees the official mark as "a defensive measure" and "a shield" that would prevent others from reproducing the design. He also questioned CJC's standing before the court, saying Congress does not use a menorah as an emblem.

White said CPM "very clearly" stated in its application that its objective is to convert Jews to Christianity.

CPM, whose members concede to being Jewish believers in "Yeshua" (Jesus), says it is merely trying to protect a symbol it has been using on its stationery and newsletters since at least 1988. The organization operates a small Toronto branch on Sheppard Avenue West, and claims some 100 members.

A protected mark would allow CPM to use its stylized menorah on a variety of commercial wares, including calendars, clothing, pens, coffee mugs and Bibles. Potentially, the holder of an official mark could prevent others from using the same or similar symbol for commercial purposes.

This tug-of-war over an ancient symbol began in late 1997 when CPM applied to register its menorah as a trademark with the Registrar of Trademarks at the Canadian Intellectual Property Office.

Two Toronto lawyers who specialize in intellectual property spotted the menorah in a journal that publishes trademark applications for the public to see. The lawyers alerted CJC, which filed a strongly-worded protest, saying the attempt by a Christian group to adopt a Jewish symbol was "deceptively misdescriptive."

But unknown to Congress, CPM at the same time had also applied to register the menorah as an official mark, which offers protection that is superior to a trademark.

Anyone wishing to oppose a trademark application can do so with the Registrar of Trademarks. But official marks are not published beforehand and can only be challenged in court after they are approved.

CPM was awarded the official mark in November 1999, on its fourth attempt.

In the meantime, both sides have agreed to put aside their battle over the trademark.

CJC pointed out that official mark protection is only granted to "public authorities," over which the government exercises some control. Congress questioned how CPM satisfies the definition of a public authority, which must operate for the benefit of the public and fill a public need.

CJC's lawyers also said the Registrar of Trademarks did not know the meaning of the menorah, or that CPM targets Jews for conversion. As well, Jewish organizations would be deterred from using the menorah in the future, they argued.

Mr. Justice Pierre Blais reserved his decision.

LAG B'OMER PROGRAM: Yeshivas Lubavitch Toronto held a Lag b'Omer program last week along with the Shmuel Zahavy Cheder Chabad, Ohr Menachem School, the Jewish Russian Community Centre, Eitz Chaim, Bais Chaya Mushka, Torah Tots and many others. More than 300 children participated in the program, which began at the Lubavitch Community Centre and continued with a parade on Bathurst Street that headed north to the Beth Avraham Yoseph shul in Thornhill. Israel like canary in coal mine: Bar-Ilan president

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — If a poisonous chloride atom and a poisonous sodium atom can combine to form table salt, then surely the secular and religious can come together and create sugar, says the president of Bar-Ilan University.

Not that he would suggest either sector is poisonous, Moshe Kaveh said in a recent lecture here. Coincidentally, or not, the Ramat Gan campus he heads – the only university in Israel where students are required to take Jewish studies – has a student population equally divided among secular and Orthodox.

Kaveh, a modern Orthodox Torah scholar and a physicist, spoke at Beth Tzedec Congregation for the Moshe J. & Louis Weisfeld Annual Memorial Lecture on the Israeli Psyche Today.

The subject is emotional for Kaveh, who mourns the loss of Bar-Ilan students and close family friends in terror attacks. But his message was one of strength and pride. "I would like to uplift you," he said. "Many before [Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser] Arafat tried to eliminate us and didn't succeed."

Acknowledging that some rabbis would not like the analogy, Kaveh said Jews – having survived against the odds numerous times – exemplify Charles Darwin's "survival of the fittest" theory.

Had the Israeli newspaper Ha'aretz been around after the destruction of the Second Temple, Kaveh said, its headlines would have read: "This is the end of the Jewish movement."

More recently, in the 54 years since its establishment, Israel's achievements in areas like Jewish study and science, have been "unbelievable," Kaveh said. "We are very proud of our achievements."

Although there is dissension among the various segments of Israeli society, "we are a strong people." He said recent events have made him realize the meaning of being "a light unto the nations.

"We are fighting for democratic values, for enlightenment, and it is a great danger to everyone if, God forbid, Israel will not be successful."

Moshe Kaveh

He noted that it would have been easier and less risky for the Israel Defence Forces to bomb Jenin from the air during its recent operations there. Instead, Israel lost 23 soldiers killed in house-to-house searches. "This is a massacre?" he asked.

After much soul-searching, Kaveh has concluded that, "as painful as it is," there is no choice but to sacrifice Israeli children – soldiers – for the cause of what he called a "purified" war. Because every Jew has an obligation to Klal Yisrael – the community of Israel – it is necessary to risk one's life to save many lives in the community, he said.

When asked in a separate interview about the risks Diaspora Jews are willing or not willing to take to travel to Israel, Kaveh said that visiting Israel in times like these is very meaningful.

"My message to every Jew is, 'If you are afraid today to come to Israel, you should be extremely afraid if, God forbid, something happens to Israel."

On the other hand, he told The CJN, he can understand people's fear. "It's very difficult to cope." Following Sept. 11, Kaveh was stranded in the United States for a week. Returning to Israel, he said, he felt like he was going to the safest place in the world.

"I can understand that, from the media, it looks like every place in Israel is exploding. We are very much alive, classes are going on without any delay, professors are teaching, doing research [but] it's very painful, what we see and suffer."

As a scientist, he said in his speech, he cannot ignore a comment made by United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan, doubting that the entire world could be wrong in its condemnation of Israel.

But Israel has been wrongly condemned in the past, Kaveh noted, citing the bombing of Iraq's nuclear reactor in 1981. "We have to explain to the world that we have another nuclear reactor danger."

Israel's military offensive is much more than a war of self-defence, he said. Rather, Israel – like a canary in a coal mine – stands at the forefront of a global clash of civilizations. "We must be successful," he said. "Otherwise, evil will overcome the world."

Kaveh believes that "if the time comes that we can settle with the Palestinians," most Israelis would still be willing to compromise for the sake of peace, he told The CJN.

Jews and Muslims have a joint past, he said, noting that part of Maimonides' writings were in Arabic. "[Peace] is a big dream, which today looks impossible. I do believe it will happen. It must happen."

Within the Jewish community, he said in his speech, the year-and-a-half long intifadah has united religious and secular Jews. "Suddenly we understand… the blood of the Haredi is the same blood as a secular Jew."

When Kaveh read that the Haredi community in Israel gave candy and cakes to IDF soldiers to show their appreciation, he cried, he said. He urged the audience to remember and cherish that "special sense of unity," even when the war is over.

People connect differently, he said. If he were to force all four of his children to be physicists, he suggested, it would be a disaster.

The son of a rabbi who once considered entering the rabbinate himself, Kaveh spoke out against the religious "monopoly on Judaism" in Israel. "I don't believe it's right, because Judaism belongs to everyone. The secular people take the monopoly on democracy, which is also wrong… You have to find a way to compromise."

He believes modern Orthodoxy should play the key role in bringing people together, particularly when the current crisis is over, he told The CJN.

'We're standing firm:' Divon

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Israelis are willing to bear any burden to combat terrorism, Haim Divon, Israel's ambassador to Canada, said last week.

"There is a consensus in Israel to fight terrorism, no matter the price."

He delivered these comments about a week after Israel officially wound up Operation Defensive Shield, designed to cripple the terrorist infrastructure in the Palestinian autonomous areas of the West Bank.

In a speech at Holy Blossom Temple, Divon assured his listeners Israel is resolute. "We're not caving in. We're standing firm."

He said the Palestinian Authority, led by Yasser Arafat, has learned that terrorists will find no haven, even in refugee camps.

"We'll be after you, wherever you are. I hope Arafat got the message."

YOM HASIDDUR: Associated Hebrew Schools Grade 1 students recently participated in a Yom Hasiddur at the Posluns (Neptune) campus. The children conducted a tfillah service and read the Torah, and each received a siddur with a hand-decorated cover to take home.

After Israel's unilateral withdrawal from southern Lebanon in May 2000, Arafat, assuming Israel was weak, thought he could extract further political concessions from the Israeli government by means of violence and an uprising, Divon said.

Arafat, he added, also sought to internationalize the conflict in order to isolate Israel on the world stage.

At the Camp David summit two summers ago, Israel was willing to go to considerable lengths to meet Palestinian demands, Divon said.

"For the sake of peace, we were willing to compromise."

But Arafat held out for even more Israeli concessions, and thereby missed a golden opportunity to achieve Palestinian statehood, he said.

Divon accused Arafat of exploiting Palestinian suffering for political gain and of breaking promises to rein in terrorism.

And he claimed the Arab world is trying to de-humanize Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, who, he said, is "the ultimate expression of Israel's resolve."

Despite its current problems, Israel will prevail, Divon said. Thanking Canadian Jews for their support, he said, "We're going to make it, the way we've overcome our difficulties in the past. We're going to endure because our cause is just."

During a question-and-answer session, Divon made the following points :

- Arafat must make a "strategic decision" to abandon violence.
- Unilateral separation is an option Israel can exercise if the peace process dies.
- Saudi Arabia's recent peace proposal, which calls for the Arab world to recognize Israel's right to exist and to normalize relations with the Jewish state in exchange for Israel's withdrawal from lands captured in 1967, is "very interesting and even encouraging."
- Canadian media are generally "pretty fair and balanced" in covering the Arab-Israeli dispute, particularly compared to European media.
- Israel has no alternative but to deal with Arafat, although he is less than an ideal negotiating partner.

Divon was introduced by Canadian filmmaker Robert Lantos, who said the current struggle in the Middle East is not about borders or pieces of land, but about Israel's right to exist.

Lantos lamented that Israel is losing "the war of words," the propaganda battle, to the Palestinians.

"Words create reality," Lantos said. "Words are the battleground."

NEW SISLEY FOR HONDA LOCATION REFLECTS FAMILY TRADITION

MANY INNOVATIVE CONCEPTS TO BETTER CUSTOMER SATISFACTION

The Sisley name has stood for quality and service among Toronto's retail automotive industry for three generations.

With the opening of the new Sisley For Honda location at 88 Steeles Ave. West, just around the corner from the former Yonge Street site, Hugh Sisley has added a number of innovative concepts that takes customer service and satisfaction to a new level in the Toronto area.

M. M. Sisley Ltd. 1940's

"About five years ago we realized that our business was growing so rapidly that we were quickly going to outgrow our facilities," says Hugh Sisley.

"As we started to plan what is now our new Steeles Avenue location we wanted to be able to provide our customers with a new experience in purchasing and servicing their automobiles - an experience that couldn't be provided by a traditional dealership style building."

"So we collaborated with our architects, our customers and Honda Canada to make this concept a reality," states Sisley of his new 42,000 square foot dealership.

"I am a customer when I go shopping and I know how I feel and want to be treated," he added. "It just made sense to talk with our customers about what they would like to see in a new dealership."

OPEN CONCEPT

In addition, Sisley visited other dealerships throughout North America, Europe and Japan to get ideas that lead to his open concept facility.

He says to make our customers more at ease, our sales staff, including the sales managers, are all out on the showroom floor so that our customers can see the entire sales process — including the consultation that goes on between the Sales Managers and their Sales Representative during the price negotiations.

"Similarly, service customers are more comfortable if they can see their cars being serviced and so we created full window access to our 25 service bays. You can actually look into the dealership from the front of the building and see what's going on in the back."

"In essence, we wanted to provide complete transparency for customers in all aspects of the purchase and service experience."

SERVICE IS A FAMILY TRADITION

"Both my late grandfather M.M. Sisley, who opened a Chrysler Dealership in 1946 on Yonge Street just north of Sheppard and my late father A.D. Sisley who later joined him in the business, were strong believers in providing the best service possible."

While the dealership changed from Chrysler to American Motors in 1958, to Datsun in 1967 and finally to Honda in 1977, service has always been a constant.

"Both would be approving of the new open and friendly concept we created at our new Steeles Ave. site," he says. "This approach has been a cornerstone part of my business philosophy since I became President of Sisley Motors Limited in 1993."

Among the many customer-friendly features we offer are a Children's Play Area, a full Café with patio, the "Sisley Dream Shop" where customers can purchase a wide selection of merchandise to augment their automotive experience from clothes, model cars and gadgets as well as our "Performance Shop" where one can obtain a large variety of accessories to customize their cars such as mag wheels, high performance gauges, racing seats, interior trim kits , to name a few.

Showroom designs makes customers feel more at ease.

SUCCESS MUST BE EARNED

With more than 10,000 customers, Sisley for Honda is one of the largest Honda retailers, in Canada.

He says there are three major components to our success. They are:

- Offer superior products and service at competitive prices,
- Market our organization through community work and advertising,
- Employ a stable and customer-oriented staff.

"Most of our highly-trained and professional staff have been with the company for years. One of our technicians, Ed Osborne, has worked with all three generations of the Sisley family starting with my grandfather in 1948 and continues to service our customers' needs today!"

He says most of his staff, of about 90 people, live in the north Toronto area.

"As part of our commitment to customer service, we have built a staff training centre to assist our employees with product knowledge, customer relations, and technical training. It all leads to a more open and transparent relationship with customers," Sisley adds.

This same perspective was also taken by Hugh and his father Don towards their industry peers. Both served as President of the Toronto Automobile Dealers Association (TADA) and sat on the board of Canadian Automobile Dealers Association and were involved in developing policies that have lead to better consumer protection.

Under Hugh's leadership, the TADA worked with the Ontario Motor Vehicle Industry Council to greatly strengthen guidelines governing the industry's advertising code that makes all automotive advertising much clearer.

CUSTOMER SEMINARS

"Our experience has been that when customers first purchase or lease their cars, they are too excited to absorb all the information that we have to share with them about their new vehicle. So we hold monthly 'Customer Orientation Seminars' that explain the many 'how to's' of an automobile from changing a tire to providing a better understanding of how a car works in general."

"This allows them to receive this important information in a relaxing environment at a time that they can concentrate and absorb it all without the distraction of waiting to show off their new pride and joy to their friends and neighbours."

We are also proud of our involvement in the ever growing north end of Toronto through the sponsorship of programs such as children's baseball and hockey teams to the Thornhill Community Band, to name a few.

Our new facilities enable us to meet the needs of our customers - today and for the future.

Thirty-five years ago

For the generation born after 1967, only the pages of a text can bring alive that moment some 35 years ago, when IDF paratroopers reunited what had been mockingly, callously divided by Jordanian forces some 19 years earlier: Jerusalem.

The Jews of the old, walled city had been forcibly removed, in 1948, from the quarter in which they had lived for countless years. Synagogues were destroyed, Jewish graves were desecrated, Jewish homes and shops were vandalized.

For the first time in its history, Jerusalem was divided, east from west, old from new, by cinder block and barbed wire.

But for the generation born before 1967, the memory of the city's reunification will always be fresh, tearful, exhilarating and inspiring, a testament outside of time against the attempt to erode truth.

General Uzi Narkiss, born in Jerusalem, was the commanding officer of the forces that liberated and reunited the Old City of Jerusalem. The following is an excerpt of his account of that metaphysical moment on Wednesday, the 28th of Iyar, 5727; June 7, 1967:

"We made our excited way through the streets to the Mughrabis Gate, along a dim alley, turned right down a flight of steps, impatiently faced another right turn – and there it was. The Western Wall. I quivered with memory. Tall and awesome and glorious, with the same ferns creeping between the great stones, some of them inscribed.

"Silently I bowed my head. In the narrow space were paratroopers, begrimed, fatigued, overburdened with weapons. And they wept. They were not 'wailing at the Western Wall,' not lamenting in the fashion familiar during the Wall's millennia of being. These were tears of joy, of love, of passion, of an undreamed of first reunion with the ancient monument to devotion and to prayer. They clung to its stones, kissed them, these rough, battle-weary paratroopers, their lips framing the Shema. Returned, it seemed, to the Temple...

"But more exalted, prouder than all of them, was Rabbi [Shlomo] Goren. Wrapped in a tallit, blowing the shofar and roaring like a lion: 'Blessed be the Lord God, Comforter of Zion and Builder of Jerusalem, Amen'...

"The restrained weeping became sobs, full-throated, an uncurbed emotional outburst. Sorrow, fervour, happiness and pain combined to produce this mass of grieving and joyous men, their cheeks wet, their voices unsteady. Again the shofar was blown: tekiah... followed by a shvarim... And Rabbi Goren intoned, like a herald: 'This year, at this hour, in Jerusalem'." (From The Jerusalem Anthology, R. Hammer, JPS, 1995)

As we reflect today, on that moment 35 years ago, Jews of all generations, whether born before or after 1967, must carry Rabbi Goren's words deep within our hearts. For us, Jerusalem must always be "this year, at this hour."

Israeli products a click away

At this most difficult time in our history, the Jewish community's support is more critical to Israel's vitality and strength then ever before.

Throughout its history, the State of Israel has utilized its natural resources and talented citizens to create uniquely Israeli products. Now, for the very first time, a variety of Israeli products are available online in one location: http://www.israelexport.org/. With a click of your mouse, you can order Israeli wine, chocolate, Judaica and much more. I encourage readers of The CJN to visit http://www.israelexport.org/.

Things you can do to help Israel

Israel is at war for its right to exist as a free and democratic Jewish state. It is also in a major recession due to its security problems. Here are a few things you can do to help:

1. Buy Israeli products, and boycott those of its enemies.
2. Buy stocks in Israeli companies.
3. Buy Israel bonds.
4. Respond favourably when called upon by the local UJA and the other communal organizations supporting Israel during this time of crisis.
5. Help Israeli soldiers have a better quality of life by giving to charities that help them.
6. Fly El-Al.
7. Write or call your friends in Israel to give them support.
8. Educate yourself about Israel.
9. Fight anti-Semitism.
10. Tell United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan what you think.
11. Contact your MP and other government officials and tell them what you think.
12. Set up or join an Israel action committee for specific projects within your synagogue, community group or circle of friends.
13. Monitor the media and respond to biased reporting on Israel.

For the sake of Israel and Jewish survival, we should act now and devote a few minutes each day to writing a few sentences in support and to sending them to as many people as possible.

Why I'm still in Israel

During the last few weeks, people have constantly been asked me: "Why are you not going back to Canada? Why are you still in Israel when you have a choice and don't need to be here?" For some reason, it is difficult for others to understand that I love this country, regardless of the situation.

It is hard for me to find the words to describe my year here. As it comes to an end and I look back on my experiences, I am reminded that it has been unforgettable. Surely my life has changed as a result of the security situation. I do not go to places that I might have gone to in the past. I am forced to be more aware of my surroundings, and in general, to be smart and mature about my actions while continuing to live and enjoy my stay here. I will not lie and tell you that these days are not scary, because they are.

On the other hand, I know that things always seem worse from afar. Being here during these sad times has matured me and made me take a different perspective on life while bringing me even closer to Israel and its people. This country has too much to offer despite all that is going on, and one simply needs to be careful while experiencing his or her year to the fullest. The bottom line is that I am happy here.

Norway's economic boycott

I recently read in Ha'aretz that the government of Norway has advised an Israeli company, R.B. Tec, that it is not eligible to bid on a contract to provide technical equipment to the government of Norway – ostensibly because the government of Norway disagrees with Israel's policies and actions with respect to the West Bank and Gaza.

I wonder if the ban on Israeli companies doing business with Norway also extends to any company owned or controlled by Jews who support Israel or perhaps to any company owned or controlled by Jews at all?

I see little difference between this decision and the posting of a stormtrooper outside a Jewish store with a sign on its window that reads "Owned by Jews."

Despite everything, still optimistic for peace

By MAYA GOLDENBERG

I was born in Israel and lived there all my life. I served in the Israel Defence Forces for two years. For the past eight months, I have been living in Toronto. This past Passover, I returned to Israel for a brief vacation with my husband and three children.

I found the Israel of 2002 cohesive and strong in spirit, but also sadly skeptical about the future of the peace process. The many of us who witnessed the birth of the negotiations with our Palestinian neighbours with hope and anticipation feel as though we have received a painful slap in the face. For those who never believed in the process, the current events are a prophecy fulfilled.

I have always held a strong conviction – and I still believe – that both sides of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict are destined to march together through a deep socialization process that will eventually see us living side by side. I have always believed, as I believe now, especially as the conflict gets more deadly, that there is no other path.

Nineteen months of devastating terror attacks, 19 months of hundreds of dead innocent people, dozens of torn families, and endless pain have left an irreversible scar upon Israeli society. Travelling in Israel for two weeks left me with a feeling of a nation in a war without a frontier. The conflict can be anywhere, at any time.

I found myself between two generations that are seeking answers. On the one side was my parents' generation, survivors of the Holocaust. On the other side were my children who kept asking penetrating questions.

My parents, who survived the Nazi camps in eastern Europe, who believed that they had seen all the horror mankind can produce, as a result of the last 19 months of the "intifadah" have lost their sense of security. The devastating terror attacks have left them and many other survivors in Israel with terrible fears, renewing their war memories that they had tried to repress for more than 50 years. This time, they are reliving the horror in their own country. The mental struggles of these survivors, most of whom are in their 70s or 80s, are almost unimaginable.

As for my children, the continuing terror attacks all over Israel, innocent children murdered and many others left with no parents or relatives, confuses them. Avoiding crowded places like McDonald's, pizzerias and public transportation is no simple restriction for children. My nine-year-old has asked me: Why do the Palestinian suicide bombers target kids? Have I done anything to the Palestinian children? Why do they want to kill me? And so on.

Naturally, as a parent, I feel I must address those questions. But I have found the situation, especially as viewed from the left, extremely complicated.

I feel the need to remind my children how history has unfolded for the Jewish people during the last decades. Wars and regional conflicts do not go on forever. People tend to seek solutions and compromise. Let us not forget that the State of Israel was born May 14, 1948, following the brutal murder of six million Jews. On Nov. 29, 1947, the United Nations affirmed the legitimate right of the Jewish people to establish their own state. To counter the ongoing brainwashing of Palestinian extremists who claim that Israel has no right to exist, I explained that this recognition is not, under any circumstances, to be abrogated.

Israelis dream of and seek peace. The current terror attacks on Israel civilians by extremist Palestinian suicide bombers, and Israel's military response as it tries to excise the terror's origins, will not bring either side closer to this goal. I believe the Palestinian people deserve their independence and sovereignty. But they must realize that under no circumstances is terror an acceptable tactic. In a society where a person is valued only when he or she becomes a suicide bomber, a shaheed (saint), there is absolutely no hope for peace. Once the Palestinian leadership understands and implements this, Israel's hopes for peace can revive.

I see a socialization process as a pre-condition for peace. The vast majority of the Palestinian people want peace. Terrorists and other extremists are in the minority. The majority of Israelis also pray for peace. But this is not enough.

Palestinian society is desperately in need of a stable leadership that will fulfil their basic economic and social needs. The Palestinians must eradicate the hatred and desire for revenge from their educational system. Israelis must get used to the fact that making peace requires compromises. Unfortunately, not all of us agree on that fundamental principle. But looking back at our relatively short history as an independent state, who would have believed that then-prime minister Menachem Begin (Likud) would sign the historic peace treaty with Egyptian president Anwar Sadat in 1977 and agree to the painful compromise of returning the Sinai?

Despite having witnessed the current terror attacks on Israel, as well as having to cope with the concerns of both the younger and older generations of my family, I remain very optimistic. My optimism is based, first, on the historical pattern of peace evolving from conflict, and second, on what I saw and felt during the flowering years of the peace process, especially during Yitzhak Rabin's tenure from 1992 to 1996.

I know it may take longer now to get back to where we were. I also know, through meeting with them, that most Palestinians want to live in peace with Israel. Unfortunately, their leadership, headed by Yasser Arafat, missed a historic breakthrough during Ehud Barak's government and former U.S. president Bill Clinton's administration in 2000. Today we know that Arafat's leadership is not yet ready for peace.

But Israel is a strong, democratic state. No obstacle will prevent us from seeking peace with our Palestinian neighbours. In the Middle East's history of wars and regional conflicts, there are unfortunately no shortcuts. We will have to go through the whole confidence-building process all over again, this time hopefully with a mature Palestinian leadership that is truly concerned with the welfare of its own people.

Khaldoun, from a West Bank village near Hebron, has undergone six heart surgeries at the hands of Israeli medical staff since being taken to Israel's Wolfson Hospital in Holon. Yitshak Frenkel, bottom right, a representative of Israeli families whose sons were killed by Palestinians, shakes hands with Zenab Al Dagour, whose son was killed by Israeli soldiers. The pair, along with others from Israeli and Palestinian families that have lost sons to the ongoing Mideast conflict, prayed together for peace in July, 2000 on the eve of the failed Camp David summit. [RNS/Reuters photos]

One problem, two views

The other day, I picked up an editorial article that appeared in the National Post on April 5. The editorial page had two interesting articles side by side: one was entitled Israel's just campaign, written by the editorial board of the paper, expressing the Post's own opinion, and the other half of the same page was a report entitled Churches identify root causes of uprising.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The article dealing with the attitude of the churches reveal a significant prejudice against Israel and its policies. The last paragraph begins by stating this: "While feeling deeply for Israeli victims, and passionately for the continued security and well-being of Israel, the United Church nevertheless strongly states that the root of the violence and the instability of the region is Israel's illegal occupation of Palestinian territories."

Just what does this latter geographical description mean? For all too many it means – although it is not expressed in this fashion – that Israel itself is basically illegitimate. After all, Israel inhabits a land that once was known as Palestine, and it strikes me that this lack of clarity in the churches' attitude is not accidental.

There are enemies of Israel who passionately believe that all the troubles in the Middle East are due to the Jewish State – a situation that can only be resolved by Israel's disappearance. Since this is unlikely to take place, Israel remains, in their opinion, the root cause of all the troubles in the area.

That of course is nothing new in Jewish history. How often have we been described as the root cause of the greatest varieties of problems – even if we had nothing whatsoever to do with anything concerning them.

In the view of many "objective" critics of Israel, the Jewish State would satisfy them best by disappearing altogether. They will not say this of course, but a close reading of their literature makes it quite clear.

Therefore, since Israel will not accommodate this desire, the problem will continue to exist. Israel's critics and enemies are of course not very happy with that conclusion – too bad.

The sad part in all of this is that 54 years after its establishment, the Jewish State still has to justify its existence. Not surprisingly, this need has been imposed on the Jewish people as a whole, though we have been around for well over 2,000 years. That would be more than enough for any people, but in this respect too, we are different. For us, of course, the most important thing is not what others think, but that we ourselves have a proper sense of self-worth.

L'Hitraot, for awhile

The time is almost here. Very soon, I will have two hard-earned letters after my name (and a few in front too – I found out recently that I will soon be an aunt!). For the past four years, I simply did not believe the time would ever come when I would graduate. I do not mean to sound naive; it just never occurred to me that there would be a conclusion. With all the schlepping – from a student residence, to a house, and then packing to go back to Toronto for a short time and then repacking to go back to school, to camp, to Toronto, etc. – the past four years seemed like an interesting journey with no real end date.

Darcie Richler in Halifax

As I was packing up my apartment recently (in my usual obsessive manner), I began to really take in how eventful the past four years have been. Going through mounds of papers and books, it finally occurred to me that so much has gone on, despite my not always having noticed it. And while frantically writing papers and exams simultaneously (we can thank the recent four-week faculty strike here at Dalhousie University for that), I found myself wondering what I have been doing while I have been here in Halifax. I wondered if I have even learned anything during the past four years.

While packing up to leave, I looked around and realized that almost everything around me was there because I had chosen for it to be there. I spent four years making decisions for myself: what classes to take, where to live, what to eat, who to be friends with, and this was all because of my university experience. I cannot recall what I wrote in my exam this morning – which is kind of pathetic. But with the utmost amount of clarity, I am able to recall so much of what I have learned these past few years outside of school, as a result of being in school.

> 'I have fallen in love with this place'

In my family, it was simply assumed that my siblings and I would pursue higher education after high school. At the age of 18, I seemed not to care either way, but I chose Dalhousie because it is in a great city and "far enough" away. Going to university also appeared to be the right decision mainly because it would both keep me occupied and my parents content at the same time.

The initial nonchalant feelings dissipated pretty quickly. I have fallen in love with this place – the community, the ocean, indeed, with the entire experience.

So, as I sit here and type my final column from my cozy Halifax home, I find myself feeling a little melancholy. I know that I am closing one great chapter and, hopefully, starting a new one. It also seems evident that it would be impossible to go where I plan to go without having gone through this stage first.

Being away from home and at university has been a pivotal time for me. This place was where I developed a more conscious Jewish identity. It was where I realized that I did not have "all the answers," nor would I ever have them if I had the attitude that I, and most others, did in high school.

It was here that I began to see through the transparencies in people who were not right for me and to embrace those who were. Being here forced me to create my own happiness and take responsibility for things that did not go my way. It was also where I really began to appreciate my family: I missed them whenever we were not in the same city, and went a little insane when we reunited.

I have chosen to drive back to Toronto, to withdraw from the Atlantic Canada experience – for now – as slowly as possible. To all those receiving their university and college acceptances soon, don't think twice, go! If you are struggling to decide where to go, just do what feels right. You can't go wrong. And I hope you all find your own Halifax.

Anti-Semitism: the new trend

We all know about trends: the Gap, Pokemon, Nintendo, Star Wars and even the war on terror qualify. In the last few weeks, a new and fresh trend has resurfaced in our culture: anti-Semitism. That's right folks, anti-Semitism is in these days.

Bryan Borzykowski in Winnipeg

I am in the midst of something that I have never before experienced. It all began just a few weeks ago, when stories about Israel's destruction in Jenin and its blowing holes in the Church of Nativity began saturating the media. These stories made me nervous because they were relentless. Even though there were times where CNN would say that the massacre in Jenin could not be verified by anyone, the damage was already done. People's minds were made up, fallacies were planted in their brains: the Jews have massacred innocent civilians.

I was on a Winnipeg activist list group for a while. No, I'm not an activist, but I do like to know what's going on around town. But the key word in this paragraph's first sentence is "was." Once Israel was in the news, people on this list began to discuss the Mideast issue with messages referring to the Israelis as murderers, and calling for people to send money and support for the Palestinians. I read all of this in frustration until I couldn't take it anymore and left the list.

Then you have the Manitoban, the University of Manitoba's main student newspaper, which has been publishing very anti-Israel articles. And you have synagogues being burned right here in Canada, NDP MP Svend Robinson slamming Israel and an anti-Semitic, racist government leader one vote away from becoming the president of France. Sound familiar, anyone?

What does this all mean for Jews? I had a depressing conversation with some relatives recently about the possibility of our not being offered jobs because of our faith. Before this conversation, that thought had never crossed my mind, but since then, I can't stop thinking about it, because they are right. Today, with the way the world is going right now, the possibility of not getting a job because I am Jewish is a real one. When your average person – and I'm talking about people who probably don't know any Jews or who have minimal contact with Jewish people – hear the word Jew, they think of Israel and how awful we are. I read an excellent article in the Winnipeg Free Press recently that said when someone is anti-Israel, they are really anti-Jewish. While I actually have not read any articles or heard anyone say, "Jews are the evil of the world," destroying synagogues in Saskatchewan proves this attitude goes far beyond the land or government of Israel.

I really don't want to say it, but I can't help but think that this is a bit like what Jews experienced in the 1930s. Emotions that take turns running through my mind are isolation, desperation, hope, confusion, frustration and anger. The one I have felt the most since CNN began distorting the news is probably isolation. Israel (and Jews) are being singled out in the world, especially by the media and European countries, as murderers and this does make me feel somewhat alone at times.

I have some hope, though. Israel was created mainly in response to the Holocaust. So it is comforting to know there is a place where Jews can go to live as Jews. There are also more prominent Jews taking a stand against anti-Semitism, and there are large and active Jewish communities that have organized successful rallies and are making sure our voices are being heard.

But regardless of what our communities are doing, the fact remains that the latest trend sweeping the nations is anti-Semitism.

The Jewish documentary has come of age

The Toronto Jewish Film Festival, which ended on April 28, presented an eclectic array of documentaries this year, from Garry Beitel's My Dear Clara, a poignant real-life love story set in Europe and Canada, to Michael Karpin's A Bomb in the Basement, a chilling account of Israel's atomic bomb program. These movies, as well as others I managed to see, were thoughtful, occasionally moving and professionally crafted. They signified, to me at least, that the Jewish documentary film has come of age.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

My Dear Clara packs a lot of emotions into 44 minutes. In fact, the fate of a people and of two separated star-crossed lovers are at its core. Clara Greenspan, a 26-year-old Polish Jew living in Montreal, travelled to Poland in the summer of 1938 to visit relatives and friends whom she had left behind in Warsaw. There she met Chaim Blum, a plumber with whom she fell in love. Personal chemistry, as well as a shared belief in communism, brought them together. But could Chaim join Clara in Montreal?

Having been told she could sponsor Chaim if they got married, the young couple took the plunge. She left Poland, certain they would be reunited in Canada. Much to her bitter disappointment, Chaim was ineligible for Canadian citizenship. Canada's outdated and absurd immigration law did not allow a wife to sponsor a foreign husband. Can you imagine?

While she pined for Chaim, he sent her fervent love letters. "I don't want this dream to end," he wrote in one missive. In subsequent exchanges, Chaim described the rising tide of anti-Semitism in Poland and warned of the threat of war looming over Europe.

Clara, in the meantime, asked her uncle to sponsor Chaim. His application was rejected. Little did they know that Canada clung to racially restrictive and anti-Semitic immigration regulations, as historians Irving Abella and Harold Troper demonstrated beyond a doubt in the book None Is Too Many.

Shortly after Germany's invasion of Poland, which doomed the country's three million Jews, Chaim and his sister escaped to safety in the Soviet Union's occupation zone in Poland. From Brest Litovsk, they made their way to Uzbekistan. At that point, Chaim and Clara lost touch. But in 1945, she learned that Chaim was alive. Some months later, she received a letter from him postmarked Lodz, Poland. She was elated, but how could she facilitate his immigration to Canada?

Out of sheer desperation, Clara took her case straight to Canada's prime minister, Mackenzie King, who mercifully broke the cruel bureaucratic logjam. Chaim arrived in Canada by steamship on Aug. 12, 1947. Together at last. But there was a hitch. Chaim, having experienced communism first-hand, had turned away from it, something Clara found difficult to accept. Nevertheless, as their two children relate, Clara and Chaim overcame their political differences.

Supplemented by absorbing archival footage and touching still photographs, My Dear Clara, its abrupt denouement notwithstanding, is an affecting testament of the power of love and the mountains it can move. That Beitel's film is a labour of love is hardly surprising. Clara and Chaim are his aunt and uncle.

The strange spiritual odyssey of Oswald Rufeisen, otherwise known as Brother Daniel, transfixed a nation. In the early 1960s, this quixotic Jewish Holocaust survivor, who had converted to Christianity during the war and had become a Carmelite priest, petitioned Israel's Supreme Court for recognition as a Jew in his Israeli identity card and under Israel's Law of Return. "I am a Jew of the Catholic religion," he said, touching off the divisive "Who is a Jew?" debate.

Amir Gera, in Brother Daniel: The Last Jew, takes a close look at this unusual man. Born and raised in Poland, Rufeisen was caught up in the trauma of the Holocaust. Having passed himself off as a Christian of Polish and German ethnicity, he was hired as a translator by a local German commandant. In this capacity, he witnessed wholesale massacres of Jews. Tormented by the killings, he gave the Jewish elders of the town of Meer advance notice of their community's imminent liquidation. This heroic act, while enabling some Jews to save themselves, exposed him to hard scrutiny. The upshot of it all was that he confessed to being a Jew, and escaped.

Frightened and alone, he found a haven in a monastery, and sustenance in Christianity. Rufeisen converted. "I was granted a new life," he said. "I was a new human being." Yet he always considered himself Jewish.

Wearing a brown cassock, he arrived in Israel, "my homeland," in 1959, taking up his duties in Haifa's Stella Maris monastery. His goal was to bring Christianity back to its Jewish roots. Despite his vow of celibacy, he had a close relationship with a woman, a German who was a member of Haifa's Hebrew Christian community.

The film, which is riveting, unfolds seamlessly through interviews with Rufeisen (who died a few years ago), his brother Aryeh, his sister-in-law, his mistress, a former Supreme Court judge and a number of other people who crossed his path.

To David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister, Israel's vulnerability was a constant source of deep concern. Having resolved that Israel needed an "ultimate deterrent" to ensure its survival in the face of Arab hostility, he decided to build an atomic shield, the subject of Karpin's A Bomb in the Basement: Israel's Nuclear Option, based in part on Avner Cohen's Israel and the Bomb, published in 1998. To the best of my knowledge, it's the first film of its kind to deal exhaustively with this topic, and, fortunately, it's first-rate.

Clara Greenspan and Chaim Blum

There was much opposition to Ben-Gurion's idea. The military feared the costly project would drain funds from its budget. The ministry of finance thought it would bankrupt Israel. The United States and other members of the exclusive nuclear club were none too keen to admit an interloper like Israel. And, naysayers asked, where would Israel obtain scarce and guarded materials like enriched uranium?

Thanks to a confluence of events, the war waged by France in Algeria and the rise of Gamal Abdel Nasser in Egypt, Israel enlisted the support of the French government. France not only sold Israel advanced aircraft, it also agreed to build a nuclear reactor in Dimona.

Shimon Peres, the director-general of the ministry of defence and Ben-Gurion's protege, was placed in charge of the project. He worked behind the back of Golda Meir, the foreign minister, who opposed the acquisition of an A-bomb. Karpin, whose frank interviews with Peres form the heart and soul of the film, chronicles the development of the program and fleshes out its personalities. In addition, he analyzes Washington's nuanced attitude toward it and explains how it had an inhibiting effect on Egypt's strategic objectives in the 1973 war.

Karpin claims that Israel has an armoury of about 200 atomic bombs today, but has armed its nuclear weapons on only three occasions: the Six Day War, the Yom Kippur War and the 1991 Gulf War.

The Bombing, by Simone Bitton, turns on a 1997 Palestinian suicide bombing in Jerusalem that snuffed out the lives of five Israelis, including three teenage girls. Bitton revisits the scene of devastation and interviews the parents of the deceased and injured and the family of one of the bombers. A woman who lost her husband in the blast expresses anger at the bomber's family for having instilled hatred in him. The parents of one of the perpetrators are surprised he was capable of such an act. The mother of a victim voices sympathy for the plight of the Palestinians. The father of one of the girls gives voice to his profound pain. The wife of a peace activist who was killed by the explosion can't understand why he, of all people, had to die.

These conflicting emotions shape the movie's tone and tenor.

Before the outbreak of the current intifadah, a Palestinian who sought an entry permit to visit Israel stood a good chance of getting one by joining an organized tour. The Inner Tour, by Ra'anan Alexandrowicz, taps into the varied reactions of such tourists. It is an exercise in nostalgia, lamentation, fascination, envy and repressed anger. The Palestinians, from the West Bank and Jordan, stop at Rosh Hanikra, Kibbutz Hanita, Acre, Tel Aviv and Jaffa during a three-day bus trip in the spring of 2000. Intriguing stuff.

Florentene, Israel's version of the popular U.S. television sitcom Friends, lasted three years. Characterized by gritty Sabra dialogue and populated by generally appealing twentysomething characters, Florentene was like a breath of fresh air. Alas, it is now gone.

Touched by terrorism, family now helps others

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For Michael Shumacher, a transplanted Canadian in Israel, terrorism is not merely an abstraction.

It is visceral, real and close to home.

Last August, Shumacher's 15-year-old daughter, Yaffa, found herself in the wrong place at the wrong time.

She was lined up at a counter in the Sbarro pizzeria in Jerusalem when a lone suicide bomber walked in and blew himself to pieces.

The bomb he detonated killed 15 Israelis and left scores wounded, among them Yaffa and her two close friends.

Flying shrapnel hit her arms and legs and burned her neck. She suffered a broken leg, hand and arm and a shattered elbow.

A few hours later, television images beamed around the world showed Yaffa being evacuated from the destroyed restaurant on a stretcher.

The horrific incident deeply affected Shumacher and his wife, Shevy, an elementary school teacher, who made aliyah in the summer of 1978.

"Our priorities and activities have changed since the bombing," he said.

About seven months later, this past March, their 19-year-old son, Simcha, was also almost killed when a terrorist stormed Atzmona, a settlement in the Gaza Strip.

A student at Atzmona's pre-military Jewish studies program, Simcha escaped unscathed after the armed Palestinian infiltrator slipped in and killed five students and injured 23 others.

It seemed too much for one family to bear. But in both cases, the Shumachers could rely for solace on One Family, an organization founded recently to help the victims of Arab terrorism.

One Family, started by Marc Belzberg, a Canadian resident of Jerusalem, and his wife Chantal, attends to the long-term physical and emotional needs of families touched by terrorism.

It sends volunteers to visit and console hospitalized victims. It also ensures that they receive the best medical care and helps them qualify for government benefits. As well, it disburses funds and distributes goods ranging from clothing to orthopedic beds. And in a new program, Seeds of Solidarity, which runs until May 17, supporters are urged to send a floral bouquet to victims of terrorism or families of Israeli soldiers. (www.flowers4israel.org).

> 'Our priorities have changed since bombing'

One Family also organizes social events and retreats to help victims deal with their trauma, and it builds support networks.

In addition, One Family funds a camp for bereaved children who have lost a parent or parents, and it sponsors twinning programs with North American communities and builds bridges to the news media.

"We were the recipients of some of these benefits," said Shumacher in a recent interview while here on a private visit.

A 47-year-old accountant who has lived in the West Bank settlement of Maaleh Adumim for the past 12 years, Shumacher was pleased to report that Yaffa's condition, as well as that of her two friends, has improved.

Yaffa spent two weeks in hospital and then convalesced at home in a warm family environment. "She's mobile now, her arm and hand have healed and her first-degree burns have cleared away."

Yet she still requires therapy for the nerve damage in her elbow, and psychologically she wavers, Shumacher said.

The youngest of four children, Yaffa is "thrown back" by loud sounds and the drumbeat of current affairs, and she no longer frequents downtown Jerusalem.

Through Yaffa's brush with death, the Shumachers and their children have become dedicated One Family volunteers, regularly visiting terror victims.

"It's become a priority, almost a responsibility," said Shumacher, the product of a Bnei Akiva religious Zionist education.

The Shumachers are thankful that Simcha was physically untouched by the events in Atzmona. But they mourn for the five victims, all of whom were 18 years old and Simcha's friends.

Much to Shumacher's relief, Simcha has recovered. "A day after the attack, he said, 'I'm healthy in body and spirit.'" And within a week, Simcha, accompanied by his father, flew to New York City to speak about his harrowing experience at a private affair attended by former U.S. president Bill Clinton.

Shumacher, who lived in Kiryat Arba and Gilo before settling in Maaleh Adumim, believes the suicide bombings have had a marked impact on Israeli society.

"In general, people have become a lot more in touch with their loved ones. But people are restricting their movements."

To Shumacher, Israel's military sweep into the West Bank, Operation Defensive Shield, could not have come sooner. As he put it: "We couldn't be sitting ducks anymore."

Shumacher, who says he is not politically opinionated, doubts whether further Israeli incursions into the Palestinian autonomous areas can provide a long-term answer to terrorism.

On the other hand, he does not really know how Israel can deal effectively with the plague of suicide bombings.

Asked if Jews and Arabs can live in harmony, he said, "Not in this generation."

He and his wife do not regret their decision to leave Toronto and settle in Israel. "Never for a moment is it in our agenda to leave," he said. "We're not broken."

He said their children, including Zeev, 23, a real estate agent, and Meira, 20, a university student, are thoroughly Israeli.

During his visit in Toronto, Shumacher spoke to UJA Federation private meetings. He said he came away convinced that Jews in Toronto really do care about Israel and are ready to open up their pocketbooks.

Shumacher urges Canadians to write letters to Israelis who have been scarred by bombings.

"Solidarity is important," he said.

Where children can grow

Last fall, students from Grades 1 and 2 planted dozens of flower bulbs in front of Associated Hebrew Schools' Posluns campus. Today, as you approach the building, you are greeted by dozens of cheerful yellow daffodils nodding their heads in the breeze.

It's a fitting image for an elementary day school, where Jewish values are planted at a very young age. "Our goal is to have the children know where they're coming from, be proud of their heritage and feel a sense of confidence," says Betty Katzman, Judaic Studies Principal at Posluns. Associated has a second elementary school campus in Thornhill.

Katzman points proudly to the Derech Eretz (good deeds) programme. Every week, each teacher submits the name of one student who performed a good deed. These students' names are posted on a wall for all to see. "We strive to build a better world, one mitzvah (deed) at a time," says Katzman.

Like daffodils, children need the right environment in which to grow. Associated is a well-established learning institution that provides students with a strong foundation in Judaic and General studies. The school gives children the skills to be successful as Canadians and as members of the Jewish community.

Judaic studies are taught in Hebrew and emphasize Torah values, a love of Israel, respect and knowledge of a Jewish way of life. In the General Studies Division, academic requirements meet or exceed the guidelines of the Ontario Ministry of Education and Training.

Teachers instil a lifelong love of learning in each child. "Teachers use different teaching styles to suit the learning styles of the children," says Sandy Rabinowitz, Principal of Kamin Education Centre. Some students learn best by listening, while others excel in hands-on work. "We try to match children with a teacher whose natural teaching style might meet theirs better." As educators, teachers are provided with ongoing professional development.

Many children have managed to remain in a day school environment with the support of special services. Marvin Sniderman is one of the personnel responsible for tracking children who need a modified programme as a result of a psychometric assessment. He also runs a social skills programme designed to help children in primary grades understand social and emotional behaviour. He uses a dolphin puppet named Dr. Duso to tell stories and role-play with the students. "We try to relate the stories to what's going on in class," says Sniderman.

Associated shares the community's mission that "no child shall be denied a Jewish education due to the inability to pay." Students who are new to Canada and have language issues are supported through an ESL (English as a Second Language) programme. A Russian-speaking social worker acts as a liaison between new immigrant parents and teachers.

Class trips and visitors bring teaching to life. For a unit on medieval times, a knight in full armour spoke to the children in old English. Students built Lego vehicles with motors, pulleys and gears for a science workshop. A sound and rhythm unit included a visit by musicians with drums.

"Parents are looking for a school with high standards, sensitive to children's individual needs," says Rabinowitz.

There are close to 1,100 students at Kamin (Atkinson) and 350 students at Posluns (Neptune), from SK to Grade 5. For more information on choosing the best elementary school for your child, please call the admissions and tuition office at 416-494-7666, ext. 323.

Canadian teens among finalists in Bible competition

By JANICE HALPERN
Special to The CJN

Three Canadian teens had the privilege of participating this year in what has become, along with the ubiquitous barbecues, the key event of Israeli Independence Day – the International Bible Competition (Chidon Ha'Tanach Ha'Olami).

Yakov Frydman-Kohl, 17, Moshe Halpern, 18, and Rebecca Winter, 18, all graduates of the Bnei Akiva Schools Yeshivat Or Chaim and Ulpanat Orot in Toronto were among the 16 finalists from Israel and the Diaspora to compete. Broadcast live on Israeli television and radio from the Jerusalem Theatre, in front of an audience of friends, family and the lucky few who were able to acquire tickets through "protectzia," the contest was an exhilarating experience.

Representatives from each of the teen's families flew to Israel at the last minute to share in the excitement. Cheering sections from Argentina threatened to dominate, but our Canadian team was encouraged by hand-written signs and cheers from their friends who are studying with them in yeshivot and seminaries in Israel. Reuven Gellman, who had inspired these students in their love of Tanach when they were in junior high at Netivot HaTorah Day School and has since made aliyah, was invited as their honoured guest.

Israeli Minister of Education Limor Livnat, Jewish Agency Chairman Salai Meridor and Prime Minister Ariel Sharon addressed the audience, all reflecting on the study of Tanach as a binding force for Am Yisrael and as a deep reservoir of strength for the State of Israel. Livnat thanked the parents of the participants for allowing them to come to Israel in these trying times.

In all, 45 young people had arrived the week before from all over the world to participate in this rich program. During the week, they came to know first hand a country whose history, geography, even flora and fauna, was familiar to them from their studies, and they met with the president, prime minister and Israel Defence Forces Chief of Staff.

The program's participants represented Canada, the United States, Australia, England, France, Austria, Spain, Holland, Mexico, Argentina, Panama, Turkey and 10 countries from the former Soviet Union. Their tour guides were members of NaCHaT, Noar Chovevei Tanach, a group of young Israeli "lovers of the Tanach" who share the contestants' passion for the Hebrew Bible.

The results of the contest: first prize went jointly to two Israelis. Avichai Sheli, blind and hearing impaired from childhood, grabbed the microphone from a smiling Sharon to thank his parents for their unflagging support. Second prize also went to an Israeli. Third prize was awarded jointly to Canadians Yakov Frydman-Kohl and Moshe Halpern. Yakov came first in the Diaspora. Rebecca made it to the very last round.

Later, as we joined these marvelous young ambassadors at their barbecue, we felt tremendous pride and hope for the future, a hope firmly rooted in our past.

Janice Halpern is a psychiatrist in Toronto and also Moshe's mother.

Jewish continuity project launched

TORONTO — Associated Hebrew Schools Scholarship and Endowment Fund is taking applications for its new Jewish Continuity Project designed to financially assist children wishing to spend part or all of their summer vacation at a Jewish overnight camp.

Applications are available to Associated students who plan to attend a recognized Jewish summer camp and are receiving financial assistance from the camp. With assistance from private donors, Associated will match funds to qualifying children. This project helps children enjoy the experience of Jewish immersion at a summer camp while relieving some of the financial burden of the family.

Deadline for applications is May 24. Applications and additional information may be obtained by e-mailing: r.margolis@ahschools.com, or by writing to: Jewish Continuity Programme, c/o The Scholarship and Endowment Fund, 6100 Leslie Street, Willowdale, Ont., M2H 3J1.

Hana's story one of tragedy, hopefulness

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When George Brady first stepped into the office of The CJN two years ago, he wasn't sure whether his idea for a story had merit or not.

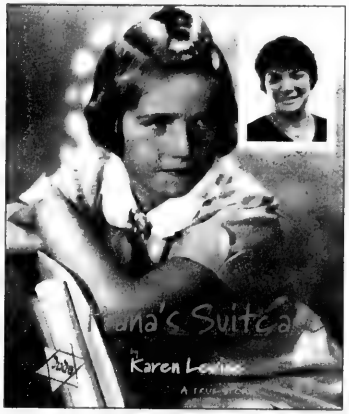
It had to to do with his sister, a teenage girl when last he saw her, who had been deported to Theresienstadt and then on to Auschwitz. In October 1944 she became one of the 1.5 million Jewish children murdered by the Nazis.

Something incredible had turned up, he explained. The Tokyo Holocaust Centre had contacted him after receiving Hana's suitcase on loan from the Auschwitz museum. The suitcase, with Hana's name on it and emblazoned with the German word for orphan, was turning into one of the centre's most popular learning tools, as children were fascinated by the suitcase's owner and what kind of life she might have led. What's more, the co-ordinator of the centre, Fumiko Ishioka, had tracked him down and was eager to hear more about him and his sister.

Was that a story? he wondered.

More than a story, Brady's incredible tale moved many readers and proved an inspiration for an award-winning radio documentary and a new children's book by CBC radio producer Karen Levine.

Hana's Suitcase (Second Story Press) traces Hana and George's happy early years in the Czechoslovak town of Nove Mesto and describes how their world was torn apart first by the arrests of their parents and later by their deportation to Theresienstadt.



Author Karen Levine (inset) and her book Hana's Suitcase.

Running parallel to that story is one that takes place in contemporary Japan as Ishioka tries to acquire tangible artifacts from the Holocaust to make the era's lessons more relevant to the children she teaches. Ishioka's quest turns into something of an international detective's story as she visits Europe and then tracks down George Brady in Toronto.

The children at the Tokyo Holocaust Centre were tremendously excited when Ishioka told them Hana had a brother who survived the war.

Hana's and George's stories combine tragedy and hopefulness, Levine said. "In that sense it's a great story for children about this miserable period."

For children – as for adults – the statistics of death during the Holocaust can be numbing and impersonal. Hana's story puts a human face to that tremendous tragedy.

"When you come at the Holocaust as history...of 1.5 million children being killed, it's very hard to find a story that will be accessible, understandable and not totally devastating to children," Levine said.

"This is one. It embraces three continents and it has [pre-war] photographs...The little face on the front cover is very compelling. She's us."

"There are two stories here," explains Second Story publisher Margie Wolfe. "You see the worst in people and you see the best. Fumiko is truly a heroine and she's brought George's memory of Hana to the world now."

As far as George Brady is concerned, "a miracle has happened. It keeps going on and on."

When he first came to The CJN with his story, Brady simply wanted to do something to keep his sister's memory alive. After their parents were arrested, he felt duty-bound to make sure his sister remained safe.

"I felt responsible to take care of my sister. I couldn't do so. She went to the cellar room (the gas chambers)," he said at the time.

Now it seems, the story has taken on a life of its own. Not only has he travelled to Japan to personally tell his story to the "Little Wings" children's performance group at the centre, but the Japanese media were also intensely interested in his story. "I got my 15 minutes of fame," he jokes.

In Canada, he has been asked to speak on numerous occasions, telling the story at schools in Montreal and Toronto, at synagogues, at universities and before cultural groups.

For Brady, the experience has proven something of a catharsis. Although he carried on with a normal life after the war and started his own family and a successful plumbing business, "I couldn't sleep. Even 50 year after it still bothered me. Now I see the good it does in Japan for tolerance. I feel good about it.

"It's like Anne Frank, who caught the imagination of everybody."

Hana's Suitcase has also caught the imagination of book publishers worldwide. Wolfe recently returned from The International Children's Book Fair in Bologna, Italy, at which publishers vied for the rights to the book in their home markets. Wolfe struck a deal to have the book translated and published in France, while a Japanese edition is to be released in the summer. She expects Dutch, Swedish, Danish and Korean versions to be negotiated in short order and she has been negotiating over the book's rights with American publishers . She expects the book may eventually be translated into 12 or 15 languages.

"It makes the Holocaust a contemporary story with a currency and importance for kids today," Wolfe explained.

Levine, who won the Peabody Award for her documentary, Children of the Holocaust, said she has been fascinated by the subject ever since she and her parents visited Buchenwald when she was a teen.

"From that point on, I read and read about the Holocaust.

"At 13 I just found the whole notion of this kind of hatred and mass murder so incomprehensible. I've spent the last 30 years trying to comprehend it and the courage of the people who resisted. I'm in awe of that and that keeps me coming back to the story.

"I have a huge admiration for George and Fumiko for bringing this story of a little girl to life."

Confronting Israel's Emergency

A Firsthand Report

The View From Jerusalem

Ronnie Appleby, Chair, Israel Emergency Campaign 2003

All around me, I am confronted with reminders of the past 20 months of relentless terror Israel has endured. Thousands are suffering from the after effects – physically, psychologically and emotionally. Yet Israel Government funding cannot go far enough, with security as the primary concern. Ben Yehuda Street lies deserted. Restaurants sit empty. The shops open and close at their scheduled times, yet few come in to buy. It is a troubling situation which requires our urgent support.

The View From Toronto

Howard Sokolowski, Chair, Israel Emergency Campaign 2003

In Toronto, I am witnessing a response to Israel Emergency Campaign 2003 I would never have thought possible. Donors have been doubling, tripling and even quadrupling their gifts. Last week, our telethons reached 7,500 homes. Gift increases for the Campaign are averaging 70%. Our community is embracing this unprecedented North American effort on behalf of Israel with remarkable commitment. In Toronto, we have already raised more than $10 million designated for Israel's human services. Together, we are demonstrating our support for the people of Israel as never before. Please join this critical campaign.

Where increased funds from Israel Emergency Campaign 2003 will go:

- Assistance for victims of terror and their families
- Increased security for children in day cares, kindergartens and other facilities
- Increased medical and psychological support plus other human services for those most affected by the crisis, particularly the poor, the elderly and new immigrants

Jewish Life

The Diaspora: home, or home away from home?

Home Lands*, By Larry Tye, Henry Holt and Company $27.50, 2001.

Are Jews outside of Israel in Galut, or exile? Can only the Jewish State assure the survival of the Jewish people? Are Jews in the Diaspora doomed to slow but inevitable extinction?

Books
Bernard Baskin

To these and similar questions, the author of this optimistic appraisal of the Jewish future answers with a resounding no.

Larry Tye, a journalist with the Boston Globe, describes Jewish life in seven far-flung cities – Dusseldorf, Dnepropetrovsk, Boston, Atlanta, Paris, Dublin and Buenos Aires. In each, he discovers a surprising vitality and religious renewal.

Although memory of the Holocaust still lingers, Dusseldorf, with its six thousand Jews is the world's fastest growing Jewish community and already surpasses its pre-Holocaust Jewish population. This city, once the home of Heinrich Heine, Felix Mendelssohn and Rabbi Leo Baeck, is thriving, especially with the recent influx of Russian Jews, many in search of better economic conditions and encouraged by Germany's generous welfare programs.

Once ravaged by pogroms and subject to both Soviet and Nazi tyranny, the Jews of the Ukrainian city of Dnepropetrovsk have been enlivened and reinvigorated, largely through the efforts of a charismatic Lubavitcher rabbi. The mostly untutored and uninformed community now has a religious day school, an old-age home, a weekly television show and even a kosher slaughterhouse.

One hundred and fifty libraries of Judaica have sprung up across the Ukraine, which now boasts 243 communities with at least some Jews, and a dozen with major Jewish populations.

In Buenos Aires, the 1994 bombing of the city's prestigious Jewish centre, with its tragic loss of life, jarred a rather passive declining community into greater religious identity and the determination to defy the anti-Semitic murderers.

Boston and Atlanta are alive with imaginative new programs – religious and secular – reaching out to questing and disaffected Jews seeking new inspiration and wholeness in Jewish life.

The author points out that Jews everywhere regard Israel as their spiritual homeland, but says the notion that "Diaspora Jews are residing in some unnatural exile is a distortion of history… Abraham, father of the Jews, discovered his God outside Israel. The Torah was given to the Jewish people outside Israel. The most important Talmud, or compilation of Jewish tradition, is the one from Babylon, not the one from Jerusalem. Even during the era of the Second Temple, more Jews lived in the Diaspora than in Israel."

Finally the author indicates that in all seven communities "there has been a dramatic reversal of generational roles, that sees children speaking Hebrew better than parents and grandparents, having a clearer grasp of their Jewish heritage and bringing older relatives back with them to the shul and classroom."

The author concludes that although the overall number of Jews will probably continue to decline, there are nevertheless many signs of strength. He is sure that never in the history of the Diaspora have there been more opportunities for Jews to connect to their Judaism educationally, culturally, and religiously. "In the future there will be fewer Jews, but better Jews."

This is a welcome, highly readable and heartening personal report, even if somewhat superficial in places and, I fear, overly enthusiastic.

The Titanic disaster 90 years later

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Last month marked the 90th anniversary of the S.S. Titanic disaster. The legendary British ship sank on the night of April 14-15, 1912, after striking an iceberg in the North Atlantic on its maiden voyage. More than 1,500 of the 2,200 people aboard perished in the tragedy, which has been memorialized in books, popular songs and movies such as James Cameron's 1997 blockbuster Titanic.

Roots & Remembrance

That film sparked a resurgence of interest in the Titanic and led to a spate of new books on various historical aspects of the ill-fated ship. One recent publication – Titanic Victims in Halifax Graveyards, by Blair Beed – is of particular interest to genealogists since it documents the burial of 150 recovered bodies in the Nova Scotian capital, including 10 ostensibly Jewish victims who were buried in the Baron de Hirsch Cemetery.

In a chapter on the Titanic's Hebrew victims, Beed relates the difficulties that the Halifax rabbi faced in identifying victims as Jewish. Despite the best of intentions, mistakes were made. Ten men were eventually buried in two rows of five, with identically-sized gravestones. But only two were positively identified; it was later proven that one was a Roman Catholic and the other a member of the Church of England.

The most famous Jewish passengers on the Titanic were Isidor and Ida Straus, the Macy's department store moguls, who were returning to New York from a winter holiday on the French Riviera; both died. (Only Mr. Straus's body ws found; he was buried in New York.) The Strauses had established a Jerusalem soup kitchen, and when their fate reached that city, some "60,000 Jewish inhabitants went into mourning… and kept a solemn fast" in their memory, according to a report in the Chicago Tribune.

Numerous participants of the JewishGen Internet discussion group have indicated they are researching relatives who had booked passage on the Titanic; several reportedly exchanged their steamship tickets at the last minute. One family did so because the April 10 sailing date was too close to the last day of Passover on April 9.

We'll likely never have a comprehensive list of Jewish Titanic passengers, but American genealogist Gertrude Ogushwitz has compiled a partial list of about 90 people based on whether their names sounded Jewish.

Surnames in first-class: Birnbaum, Brandeis, Goldenberg, Goldschmidt, Guggenheim, Hippach, Jakob, Klaber, Leader, Lewy, Meyer, Rosenbaum, Rothschild, Saloman, Stehli-Frolicher, Straus, Taussig.

Second-class: Abelson, Bowenur, Fox, Greenberg, Harris, Hart, Herman, Jacobsohn, Kantor, Lehman, Levy, Meyer, Milling, Pinsky, Troupeansky, Weitz (of Montreal).

Third-class: Aks, Cohen, Corn, Denkoff, Drapkin, Elias, Emanuel, Gilinski, Goldsmith, Goodwin, Hyman, Jonkoff, Lithman, Maisner, Markoff, Minkoff, Mitkoff, Naidenoff, Nankoff, Rath/Roth, Risien, Sadowitz, Spector, Steinman, Trembisky, Wiseman.

At 162 pages, Titanic Victims in Halifax Graveyards is published by Dtours Visitors and Convention Service of Halifax.

Jewish Year Book & Travel Guide: The British publishing house Vallentine Mitchell, in association with the Jewish Chronicle newspaper, recently published two worthy reference books.

The Jewish Year Book 2002 is a thorough compilation of information on the British Jewish community and a thumbnail survey of Jewry worldwide. The Jewish Travel Guide 2002, which lists synagogues and other Jewish facilities in many countries, bills itself as "by far the most extensive guide to the most important places around the world for the Jewish traveller." Both are available in local Jewish bookstores.

Toronto Conference: The 22nd International Conference on Jewish Genealogy takes place Aug. 4 through Aug. 9 in Toronto and features more than 100 lectures, as well as a mini-film festival. It's a wonderful opportunity that no local genealogist should miss. If you register before May 15, you pay a reduced fee. For details, visit the Web site at www.jgstoronto2002.ca/.

Shavuot for kids

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It may not have Chanukah's dreidels or Purim's greggers or the excitement of hunting down the afikoman. But there are plenty of traditions – and delightful Web sites – that will entertain and educate kids about the festival of Shavuot.

Two great places to start learning all about the holiday are at the Torah Tots Web site, which provides holiday history along with recipes, colouring pages, puzzles and quizzes [http://www.torahtots.com/holidays/shavuos/shavuot.htm], and Nurit Reshef's Shavuot Customs and Traditions [http://www.bus.ualberta.ca/yreshef/pesach/shavucustoms.html].

To test your knowledge of the day, you can play their "Replace the Pickle" game, where you are challenged to replace the word "pickle" with the correct holiday-related answer. Two examples: "We eat 'pickled' products on Shavuot" and "We decorate the 'pickle jar' with 'olives' on Shavuot."

Rahel Musleah writes in Jewish Family and Life that she has created a new holiday tradition, a Shavuot "seder." Like that more famous seder, the Shavuot seder one also has four cups, but this time, each cup is filled with a different drink to celebrate the phrase eretz zavat chalav u'dvash (a land flowing with milk and honey). For example, to honour the word zavat (flowing), fill your cup with fruit juices. Discuss this theme of "sharing our plenty" by recalling the tradition of bringing bikkurim (first fruits) to the Holy Temple starting on Shavuot [http://www.jflmail.com/articles/1099.html].

And in a tradition usually reserved for another Jewish holiday, Lois Greene Stone has instructions for creating a kreplach costume for Shavuot [http://www.jflmail.com/articles/1115.html]. Kreplach are three-cornered dumplings which on Shavuot are filled with cheese (unlike the meat variation enjoyed on other holidays), so why not take the opportunity to celebrate them? [http://www.yipc.org/new_page_63.htm]

Jill Suzanne Jacobs wants to revive a Shavuot craft tradition that kids may enjoy. Jacobs explains that in late 19th century eastern Europe, it became popular to decorate one's home with small, round paper-cuts called "Shavuos'lekh." She provides instructions for making your own [http://www.jflmail.com/articles/2122.html].

On the first night of Shavuot, there is a tradition of stayng up the entire night and studying in commemoration of the giving of the Torah [http://207.168.91.4/vjholidays/shavuot/tikkun.htm]. Jennifer Werner writes in the teenagers' Web site JVibe about a special custom her Grandma Bea shared with her on the first night of Shavuot. According to her grandmother, "On the first night of Shavuot, at exactly 12:00 midnight, the heavens opened up for a split second, and if you made a wish at exactly the right second, it was guaranteed to come true." What did Jennifer wish for? Read the article to find out [http://www.jvibe.com/realife/shavout.shtml].

If you are looking for more information about Shavuot, including some Web sites for adults, you'll find dozens of links at Jacob Richman's Hot Sites [http://www.jr.co.il/hotsites/j-hdaysh.htm] and stories for kids at Chabad's Virtual Shavuot Web site [http://www.virtualshavuot.com/].

Finally, something that I had never seen – an educational recipe. To celebrate the giving of the Torah at Shavuot, the learn@jts Kid's Corner presents the recipe for the remarkable "Bible Cake." All the ingredients for the cake are hidden in verses from Bible that you will need to decipher. As the Cake's instructions say: "Study first, then bake then eat" [http://learn.jtsa.edu/topics/kids/shavuot_together/].

Here are some of the Shavuot Bible Cake's ingredients:

2 cups Jeremiah 6:20
a pinch of Leviticus 2:13
2 cups (chopped) Nahum 3:12

I guess you can learn your cake and eat it too!

As for that "pickle quiz," we eat "dairy" products on Shavuot and we decorate the "synagogue" with "greenery and flowers."

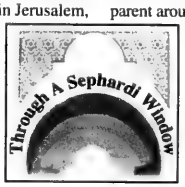
Thousands of youth going to Israel

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

It's no secret that visitors are staying away from Israel in droves. This sad fact is self-evident from the closures of restaurants and shops in Jerusalem, the near empty hotels in Tel Aviv and the deserted beaches of Eilat. Tourism and the hospitality industry are reeling.



This time, not only is adult tourist travel to Israel virtually non-existent, but the many traditional Jewish youth groups of spring and summer have also all been cancelled. One by one, operators and organizers have opted out to wait for better times, and programs have vanished.

One group alone has, as a group, not cancelled – the foreign yeshiva student population of Israel. Estimates of Anglo and European young people, mostly in their teens or early 20s, spending one or more years of Jewish study in Israeli yeshivot run between 6,000 and 9,000. This figure includes nearly 2,000 post-high school girls studying in seminaries.

The murderous terrorism of this past March was one tragically unparalleled in the short history of the State of Israel. Pesach in April had every parent around the world happy to bring their children home, not just for the holiday, but also to the perceived safety of their home.

As Pesach came and went and terrorist incidents continued to escalate (the Passover massacre, the Jerusalem bus bombing…) the question now was: would these children be returning to their studies as scheduled after the Pesach break?

Yes, was the resounding response. On the days before the yeshiva term was to begin, airline seats to Israel were impossible to get. Planes were leaving full of students refusing to cancel their plans and interrupt their studies. It was reported that on some flights from New York to Tel Aviv, the entire passenger load consisted exclusively of yeshiva boys! The only non-yeshiva person on board aside from the crew was the now very conspicuous air marshal.

Within this very observant group of yeshiva students, the words of the sages naturally carry great importance. In this instance, it was the ruling of a respected authority in Jerusalem, Rabbi Yosef Eliyashev. When repeatedly asked about the propriety of Torah study in Israel during this time, he emphatically declared that Eretz Yisrael is not a makom sakanah – not a place of peril. A makom sakanah is a halachic designation for a place that is to be avoided. That was the decisive factor in the return of 95 per cent of the yeshiva boys and girls from Europe and North America.

True, among this very special student body, there is very little if any "hanging out" or "going out." Granted also, many parents have charged their children not to stray far from their institutions and not to ride buses, but instead to travel in the perceived safety of a cab. Still, the fact that practically every yeshiva boy and girl has returned to Israel speaks volumes about their commitment to Torah, their love for the people of Israel and their loyalty to the Land of Israel.

USYers take political action

By SHIRA ZELIGER
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — With their dress suits and Israeli and Canadian flags packed neatly in their travel bags, 18 high school students, accompanied by three staff, recently departed for Ottawa for the Eastern Canadian Region of United Synagogue Youth (ECRUSY) inaugural political advocacy trip.

The students took part in the intensive, two-day seminar to learn how to become politically active in the Jewish community. Out of approximately 300 members in the region (which covers Ontario, Quebec and the Maritimes), 20 members from Hamilton, the greater Toronto area, Kingston, Ottawa and Montreal were selected to participate. Acceptance was based on leadership skills and on a personal essay.

"It was important for me to go on this trip because it was important for me to stand with Israel during her time of need," said Tania Garshowitz of Thornhill, Ont. "As well, I wanted to be able to come back to my community prepared to educate my peers about political advocacy and the conflict in the Middle East."

The first speaker the students heard upon their arrival at Ottawa's Agudath Israel Congregation was Ruben Friedman, who has worked in the public relations department of Canadian Jewish Congress. Friedman discussed the importance of political advocacy and how to successfully advocate. Rabbi Arnold Fine of Agudath Israel then talked about the Jewish perspective on political advocacy.

By the end of the day, the students said they felt empowered and optimistic about becoming more politically active and learning more about the situation in the Middle East.

"The trip provided a wonderful opportunity to brainstorm ways in which we, as Canadian Jewish youth, can support Israel from home," said Elise Loterman of Toronto.

Following a Yom Hazikaron ceremony put together by Montrealers Carmit and Liat Tzoubari, participants met with Israeli Embassy representative Amir Meimon, who talked about the current function of the embassy, as well as about Jewish pride, the importance of educating non-Jews about Israel and of countering anti-Israeli and anti-Semitic biases. Meimon also talked to the group about the cultural and industrial side of Israel that is often overshadowed by the Arab-Israeli conflict.

On Parliament Hill, participants met with Jeff Sallot, a journalist for the Globe and Mail, who discussed media bias and the Canadian government's policy towards Israel.

"The meeting was a nice warm-up in anticipation of our meetings with parliamentarians over the course of the day," said Daniel Silverman of Ottawa. "The issues discussed gave the group a chance to test their question-asking skills and to let our concerns be known to a member of the Canadian media."

Staff advisers Jonathan and Elise Levinoff and Tamara Kochberg, youth director of ECRUSY, then led an advocacy training program and an orientation about the Canadian parliamentary process.

During question period, participants saw a "full house" of notable political leaders in Canada, such as Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, Minister of Foreign Affairs Bill Graham, Canadian Alliance MP Stockwell Day and Minister of Industry Allan Rock, as well as several famous Olympic athletes who had come to the House of Commons to receive recognition for their participation in the 2002 Olympics.

"It was both amazing and amusing to listen to the politicians discuss issues that concern us as Canadian citizens, as well as international issues, such as the conflict in the Middle East," said Rachel Levy of Hamilton.

Following question period, the students had the opportunity to briefly discuss with Day and Rock their concerns and goals.

"The trip gave us, as USYers, the opportunity to voice our opinions and to put our opinions and discussions into being proactive, as well as bringing our concerns to the goverment and to professionals in the Canadian Jewish community and media," said David Goldberg of Hamilton.

Before the seminar's close, the students also met with Elinor Caplan, MP for Thornhill, Ont., and Irwin Cotler, MP for Mount Royal, to discuss Canada's Mideast policies. They agreed that the trip was an excellent educational experience.

"The political advocacy trip could not have come at a more crucial time, allowing USYers from across our region to meet face to face with some of Canada's senior politicians and to discuss matters of concern to us, including the situation in the Middle East and other issues affecting Canadian Jews," said Kochberg. "It was excellent exposure to the Canadian political system through a USY lens."

"After going on [this political advocacy trip], I learned the main essentials to go back to my community and be a successful political activist," added Jeremy Moses of Montreal.

Shira Zeliger is a Grade 12 student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. She is president of USY at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation and was a delegate on the political advocacy trip.

Shavuot study session planned

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In response to the terrorist attacks in Israel, NCSY Canada is tweaking the traditional all-night study session held on the eve of Shavuot, the holiday that commemorates the receiving of the Torah on Mount Sinai.

The Jewish outreach organization – an affiliate of the Orthodox Union known formally as National Conference of Synagogue Youth – has planned a "Learn-a-Thon for Israel" to be held by all 12 NCSY regions across North America on the night of Thurs., May 16.

Rabbi Glenn Black, director of NCSY Canada, hopes that not only teenagers but adults in various synagogues will also devote at least one hour of Tikkun Leil Shavuot study to learning about Israel, either through discussion or text.

The NCSY project, in addition to its focus on learning about Israel, will be a fund-raiser for Israeli victims of terror. Learn-a-thon participants are each asking 10 people to donate $18.

In Toronto, NCSYers will study at two locations, Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation, in Thornhill, and Shaarei Shomayim Congregation. The event begins with a late dinner and ends with dawn prayers. Refreshments will be provided throughout the night. "We're hoping to have hundreds of kids," said Rabbi Black.

"We urge all teenagers throughout the city and across Canada to join us," said Rabbi Black in a news release. He encourages those who cannot stay up all night to stay up as long as they can. "We must support our brothers and sisters in Israel who are defending the State, our State, and putting their lives on the line, every minute. Their existence is our existence."

Women to unite in prayer

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Women from across the religious spectrum are joining together to pray for Israel.

The one-hour service, to be held at the Sephardic Kehila Centre on May 22 at 8 p.m., will include prayers, footage from Israel, and a women's musical presentation.

Guest speaker will be Julia Koschitzky, chair of Israel Now, a consortium of more than 100 community organizations united in solidarity with Israel. It is under the auspices of UJA Federation and the Consulate General of Israel.

Goldie Plotkin, wife of Rabbi Avraham Plotkin, executive director and spiritual leader of Chabad Lubavitch of Markham, said the idea for the prayer service came about after a group of women at a Pesach seudah decided that women needed to unite to show their solidarity for Israel.

"Women have conducted many prayer groups, but they have been fragmented; everyone supported their own organization. That needs to be corrected. God needs to look down and see us getting along."

What is unique about the evening, Plotkin said, is that although a variety of women's groups, organizations and synagogues are participating, there is no sponsoring organization. "No one will be recognized. It is an event for women, by women, in order to show Israelis that we support them. Prayer is one way to show support."

Prayers will be posted on the wall in Hebrew and Hebrew transliteration so everyone will be comfortable praying, she said.

The Jewish community is beginning to realize that we cannot be separated, said Plotkin. "This is a new Judaism; labels are over. We are all Jewish, and we have to work together as Jews."

York U seeks input on weekend exam decision

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — York University is requesting input on its recent decision to hold weekend exams.

The Committee on Curriculum and Academic Standards is circulating an e-mail that describes the problems and concerns facing the university regarding the exam schedule and requests comments.

As reported in The CJN, York University scheduled examinations on Saturday this year and Sabbath-observant students had to make special arrangements to write them.

In addition, faculty members complained that the decision to hold weekend exams was imposed on them without proper consultation.

Zac Kaye, executive director of Jewish Campus Services, is currently preparing a submission for the committee and encourages other interested parties to do the same.

"York was created with a certain multicultural sensitivity and that was what was special about that university," Kaye said.

"The recent decision to hold exams on Saturdays turns the clock back and has definite negative connotations," he noted.

For Sabbath-observant students, Kaye said, the change in policy has added tremendous unnecessary hardships at a time when they are already under stress because of their exams.

And while York has made arrangements for students to write exams on an alternate date if an exam conflicted with their observance of the Sabbath, Kaye noted that "we are hearing from some students that the system isn't working that well."

Kaye said some students have told him that, on occasion, "accommodations for alternative dates were given by professors reluctantly."

Furthermore, many traditional students who would have otherwise been in synagogue decided to write their exams on Saturday rather than confront their teachers, he said.

The committee is requesting comments and advice on the matter until May 15 so that a report can be presented to the Senate before the end of the current academic year.

For more information, see www.yorku.ca/secretariat/senate/committees/ccas/index.htm or submit comments to York's Committee on Curriculum and Academic Standards.

Yeshiva U dean calls for balance in Jewish education

TORONTO — David Schnall believes in balancing Jewish intellectual thought with modern theories on education, family and community in order to ensure that Judaism is a "philosophy in action and not just a bag of words."

Schnall, dean of the Azrieli graduate school of Jewish education and administration at Yeshiva University, has written extensively on Jewish affairs, public policy and management issues.

His most recent book By The Sweat of Your Brow, looks at the relationship between various factors related to the workforce as seen through the application of Jewish values.

Schnall attempts to reconcile ethical, moral and religious thought with practical work-related concerns dealing with employer-employee relationships as well as with more esoteric issues such as the pursuit of Torah study as a full-time career.

Schnall was in Toronto recently as a guest of Canadian Friends of Yeshiva University, The Leon Katz Endowment and Shaarei Shomayim Brotherhood.

In an interview, Schnall noted that the key to the current Jewish renaissance is day school education and its ability to respond to the changing needs of the community.

Schnall notes that while schools may hold a key to religious and cultural continuity, they are not a replacement for effective family.

"Parenting is not absolved simply by writing a cheque or sending children to one school or another."

Nor are problems solved by simply switching a child from one school to another, Schnall added. Parents need to learn to be advocates for their children, he noted.

On the other hand, schools must strive towards providing the most progressive educational experience possible.

Schnall believes that schools need to be more efficient and effective at what they do. In addition, they must also be responsive to the demands of parents in order to remain relevant and important examples of institutional and organizational life in the Jewish community.

Day schools must not only provide "an intense exposure to Jewish life and culture," but must also strive for the best and most forward-looking education that the academic environment has to offer. At the same time, Schnall points to a great redundancy in the school environment.

"Whether a school integrates the curriculum or maintains isolated and separate curricula," the types of things that kids do in their religious studies should "reinforce their thinking abilities, their maturity, their appreciation for others, their tolerance and their sense of insight into life."

It can and should provide values that are a bedrock for effective academic attainment in all subjects, Schnall noted.

It is much more important to be able to teach students "to think in a systematic and cohesive fashion" and to leave them with the "ability to put together different worlds and cultures."

That is the key to creating an integrated human being and that is what Jewish education should be about, he added.

In particular, Schnall noted educators should "take a good hard look at what has been the traditional curriculum for boys" in the Jewish community.

"For all the debate and controversy over the role of women in Jewish education, our daughters are probably getting better schooling than our sons."

In the recent past, there really wasn't much of a definition with respect to education for young women, Schnall said.

Schnall questions the need to make the study of Talmud the centre of all religious education for young men by the time they are in Grade 4.

"In fact," Schnall said, "there are many sources in classic Jewish texts that raise serious questions as to whether young men should be studying Talmud before the age of 15 or 16.

"There is a world of culture that could easily be made to speak directly to the needs of children and young adolescents that have been ignored for them and for their teachers.

"Even within the context of Talmud and Halachah, there are areas of study that have to do with family relationships, communal responsibilities, and personal as well as international interactions," Schnall added.

Besides just mouthing communal responsibilities to Jews around the world, there's no reason our young men and women couldn't be studying texts that deal with issues relevant to their current agendas, he said.

Mideast crisis spurs special Shavuot Bonds drive

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — With Israel facing an urgent need for dollars in the wake of its ongoing crisis, the city's synagogues will take part in a special Israel Bonds sales campaign that will begin on Shavuot.

The campaign, say Rabbi Sidney Shoham and Rabbi Mordecai Zeitz, is unprecedented, and may well serve as a model for other cities.

"People are looking for ways to support Israel other than just [with] vocal support," said Rabbi Zeitz, spiritual leader of the Congregation Beth Tikvah and a member of State of Israel Bonds rabbinic cabinet in Quebec. "We have to increase the number of persons investing in Israel, who can become true stakeholders."

Rabbi Shoham, spiritual leader of the Congregation Beth Zion and a former chair of Bonds' rabbinic council, said "not one synagogue showed even the slightest hesitancy."

The campaign, which will last about two weeks and finish at the end of May, comes as Israel faces an acute economic crisis, "one of the worst in its history," according to information furnished by Bonds.

The sale of bonds would help Israel cope with $28 billion (US) in losses to its economy – five per cent of its GNP – as a result of the current crisis.

Israel's finance minister, Silvan Shalom, said his government is asking Israel Bonds to supply 50 per cent – an unprecedented level – of its foreign currency needs.

Rabbi Shoham said plans for the Montreal campaign date back to a January meeting of Bonds' North American rabbinic division leaders in Israel, which both he and Rabbi Zeitz attended.

Israel, he recalled, "was in a state I've never seen before. Gloom, doom, a total change" from before the intifadah.

A consensus that emerged from the meeting was that Bonds rabbinic leaders had to galvanize action "in any way possible," Rabbi Shoham said.

The Bonds drive will involve at least 25 synagogues with as many as 20,000 member families, and each congregation is free to gear its appeal in its own way, Rabbi Zeitz said.

While the Bonds initiative coincides with a special Israel Emergency Campaign by FEDERATION CJA also launched in response to the Mideast crisis, the two are different, Rabbi Zeitz said.

The federation campaign involves tax-deductible charitable donations, with funds earmarked for, among other things, medical services and helping victims of terror.

By comparison, funds from Bonds purchases go directly to government coffers and are urgently needed to make up for Israel's budgetary shortfall.

was never the capital of Saudi Arabia. At the time of Mohammed, Jerusalem was, in fact, under Persian administration."

Palazzi said a "Palestinian" people has never existed in history. Before 1967, the Arabs in the West Bank were Jordanians and those in Gaza were Egyptians, he said. Arafat himself, Palazzi claims, is really an Egyptian.

Palazzi, a Sufi, is the chief imam of Italy's approximately 500,000 Muslims and is director of the community's Cultural Institute, which seeks dialogue with Jews and Christians. His mother's family is originally from Syria.

He has strongly condemned Islamic fundamentalism and the dictatorial regimes in much of the Arab world, and has upheld Israel's right to use military force to defend itself.

He charges that if there had been an uprising "one-tenth" the strength of that which Israel is confronting in any Arab country, it would have been "met with an order of 'open fire' and be over in a week."

Palazzi believes many Palestinians realize they would be better off under Israeli administration than in a PLO-ruled state, but they cannot speak out, fearing for their lives or those of their children. "At least in Israel, an Arab can have a new car and be sure he will not be stopped by the police and told to hand it over because it is needed for the state. That happens under Arafat."

The Israeli-Palestinian conflict has been "artificially created" to focus attention away from the lack of economic and social progress in most of the Arab world, Palazzi argues. "The Palestinian people have been scapegoats to justify everything that is wrong in the Arab world," he said.

His visit to Canada, his first, was sponsored by the Montreal-based Canadian Institute for Jewish Research and the Asper Foundation. He spoke at the Beth Emeth Synagogue in Toronto, as well as in synagogues in Montreal and Winnipeg.

Palazzi was denounced by the Canadian Islamic Congress as an "anti-Islamic campaigner." The Waterloo, Ont.,-based organization accused the Asper Foundation of "playing with fire by using Canadian synagogues as platforms..." for his views.

Yiddish Club holds monthly meetings

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Members of the Yiddish Club of Toronto have been meeting once a month for 21 years to break bread together and speak Yiddish.

The club was started in 1981 by lawyer David Greenspan and the late Ben Kayfetz of the Canadian Jewish Congress.

"We invaded the WASP bastion of the Arcadian Court, Simpson's Tower, with 30 friends, all speaking Yiddish in a loud voice," said Les Nirenberg, one of the first members.

"We held it under the name, Thomson, Rogers Club [the name of the law firm to which Greenspan belonged]. The club was asked to find other premises by the management, who said it was disruptive to the environment."

For many years, Kayfetz chaired the meetings. He collected the lunch money, did the mailings, invited guest speakers and "handled the incredible machinery it took to run it," said his widow Eva, who attended all the club's meetings for the first 10 years.

When Kayfetz, who was suffering from Parkinson's disease, fell and broke his hip more than a year ago, Jack Jacobson, another veteran Jewish activist, inherited the chair.

The club has no set agenda, but sometimes discusses current events (even allowing English if members can't find the right words in Yiddish) and often has speakers who read Yiddish stories written by Sholom Aleichem and others.

Over the years, the club has convened in many places.

"After the Arcadian Court, we went to a little hotel on Jarvis Street, but we were not happy when they put us in the basement, and for many years, we met at Honest Ed's restaurant," said Jacobson. "When the Mirvishes sold the building, we went a few times to the Metropolitan City Hall before we moved to our present location."

Today the meetings are held at Toronto City Hall, under the sponsorship of Councillor Howard Moscoe, sometimes in a committee room, sometimes in the more spacious members' lounge.

The club's early members included Bill Stern, Bess Shockett and the late Bert Newman.

"Our motivation was to speak Yiddish to each other," Stern recalled.

"We spoke Yiddish at home," said Shirley Kumove, author of two books about Yiddish, Words and Arrows and More Words, More Arrows. Kumove's mother, Rivka, who lives with her, is 93. She and Shirley's late father, Zvi Meyer, were co-editors of Words and Arrows.

At the April meeting, Nirenberg, now retired, but continuing to work as an independent producer, spoke about his experiences as an actor-producer-writer, including his time with the CBC and with other performers in the early days of the club.

Carnage and mourning: scenes that have been repeated countless times in Israel these past 19 months.

Because of the incessant carnage and the inexpressible sadness of constant mourning, Israel mobilized the IDF.

'A just defensive war against hatred and terror'

Editorial

Not since the days surrounding the Yom Kippur War almost 30 years ago have Jews in Israel and around the world felt such anxiety about Israel's predicament.

Not since the days preceding the rise of Nazism in Europe almost 70 years ago have Jews in Israel and around the world felt such anxiety about the suddenly frequent manifestations of overt anti-Semitism.

It is no exaggeration to say that Israel – the people and the state – are under attack.

After more than 18 months of unceasing, almost daily attacks on its people by Palestinian terrorists and armed thugs, culminating in the wanton slaughter on Pesach of scores of unarmed, defenceless civilians, Israel finally decided to fight back.

Every single state on earth would do the same.

But when Israel fights back, some western observers and governmental leaders, especially in Europe, object. For them, it seems, Israel's right of self-defence is circumscribed, a lesser right than they would afford to themselves and a lesser right than they appear to afford to the Palestinian leadership – which objective, credible evidence incontrovertibly shows incites, instigates and prosecutes a war of hatred and attrition against the Jewish state.

But no objections by western observers will alter the truth, as recently articulated by Marcus Gee of the Globe and Mail, that Israel is fighting "a just defensive war against hatred and terror."

To help our readers cope with the anti-Israel and anti-Jewish materials inundating the newspapers, airwaves and television, we provide this special supplement.

First and foremost, the essays published in this section are intended to provide historical and current context to the conflict. With the generous assistance and guidance of the Canada-Israel Committee, we are able to provide articles by leading scholars. Shmuel Sandler reflects on Israel at 54; Gal Luft writes about the unique military dilemmas faced by the Israel Defence Forces as it rooted out the terrorist infrastructure; Barry Rubin reviews the career and "achievements" of Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat and Hillel Frisch writes about the coalition of terrorist organizations Arafat has built. In light of the fact that today is also the eve of Yom Yerushalayim, the day that marks the reunification of Jerusalem, we have asked noted commentator Herb Keinon to share his thoughts on any possible future discussions regarding Jerusalem.

We have also reprinted for our readers the texts of Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338 that were the result of United Nations deliberations after the Six Day War and the Yom Kippur War respectively. In addition, we reprint the only excerpt from United Nation General Assembly Resolution 194 that actually dealt with the status of the refugees after Israel's War of Independence, along with an explanatory letter by famed Israeli ambassador Abba Eban.

We also reproduce for readers Israel's Declaration of Independence, the full text of which should be kept at a retrievable distance. It not only embodies the return of the Jewish people to sovereign history, it also expresses the dreams, aspirations and hopes of Israel for a peaceful, prosperous co-existence with all its Arab neighbours.

Finally, readers will find helpful resource material to assist them in their activism on behalf of Israel.

Israel – the state and the people – are under attack. We must all respond in whatever manner we can. We hope this supplement helps our readers do so.

Israel at 54: A political reflection

By SHMUEL SANDLER

It is the afternoon of Israel's 54th Independence Day. It has become customary over the years that the people of Israel celebrate this day at picnics. While I am sure that my friends fared better than I did by celebrating in that fashion, I stayed at home awaiting the results of U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell's visit to Ramallah with Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat, watching the show on CNN, BBC and Sky News. The Israeli TV channels did not carry it live, and rightly so, as for us it is a holiday and is kept as such. Indeed, despite the current crisis, there is much to celebrate after 54 years of being an independent Jewish state and more than a century of building in the Land of Israel.

Powell opened his press conference by congratulating the Israelis on their national birthday, wishing us all the best. I did not expect Arafat to mention the fact that it was Israel's independence day as our independence day is Palestinians' Nakba (catastrophe) Day. But I was relieved that he did not do so. On the eve of Pesach, he did wish us a happy Passover, and within two hours there was a terror attack at a seder in the Park Hotel in Netanya. Twenty-eight people were murdered and dozens more were wounded. Many Israelis, including myself, now prefer not to see Arafat, nor to hear his wishes.

However, as far as understanding the latest history of the Arab-Israeli conflict is concerned, Arafat is relevant. The Palestinians can thank him for their current nakba. The symbol of their revolution is now the manifestation of their calamity. And we can thank him that he revealed his real intentions to us before it was too late. Arafat is the main factor behind the rise in the popularity of Israel's right and the devastating condition of Israel's left, including the fall of the Labour party.

It is symbolic that Arafat rejected Powell's proposals on Nakba Day. The leader of the Palestinian people turned down a proposal that could have allowed him to force an immediate Israeli withdrawal and also start a new relationship with the United States. This was not the first time he turned down such a proposal.

At Oslo in 1993 some fancied, or feared, that Arafat had finally learned he could get out of the Israelis through negotiations and a political process what he never could accomplish using violence. At Camp David in 2000, Arafat was in a win-win situation, yet he turned away. Most Israeli academics, and the public in general, were perplexed as to why Arafat turned down the generous peace offer made to him by then-prime minister Ehud Barak.

Arafat was offered virtually the equivalent of the territory both Jordan and Egypt lost during the 1967 war, the Arab part of Jerusalem and, on top of it, sovereignty over the upper portion of the Temple Mount. This was the best offer he could have expected from any Israeli prime minister. As far as both Israeli and world public opinion would have been concerned, if the deal had been sealed at Camp David 2000 and then Barak failed to deliver his share, Arafat would have been in a better position to start the intifadah. But that was not the case. Arafat rejected Barak's offer.

According to the Arafat experts in Israel's intelligence community, Arafat sees himself as the modern version of Saladdin, the legendary Muslim hero who defeated the Crusaders and expelled them from the Holy Land. Arafat's self-perception is as the symbol of the armed Palestinian struggle. It is significant that he has never taken off his uniform. Even when he received his Noble Peace Prize in 1994, Arafat accepted the prize in uniform. One is shocked as to why the international community has looked the other way and never compelled Arafat to abandon this symbol of war. Even Fidel Castro recently traded his uniform for a suit.

Protesting the rise of anti-Semitism

But why have Israeli leaders, particularly those on the left, also looked the other way? Why did they decide that Arafat was our partner for peace? There is a common denominator within the Israeli left that may explain why: the well-known phenomenon of arrogance.

I recall an academic gathering with former Labour cabinet minister Yossi Beilin following Oslo where he proclaimed that it had been easier to sign a peace agreement with the Palestinians than to fire a secretary in the Histadrut labour union. If I was a Palestinian, I would have been insulted by the comparison. Beilin also stated that, essentially, from that point on, Israel did not need world Jewry. Instead of the latter helping the Jewish State, the order would be reversed. Also at the time, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres asserted that Israel does not need hasbara (public relations), and the late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin clashed with AIPAC, claiming that the American Jewish lobby group was too hawkish for his taste.

Watching the pro-Arab demonstrations in Europe today, we can appreciate the importance of the world Jewish community to Israel's survival. Why did Beilin not see the importance of the North American Jewish community while he was a cabinet minister? Was it not clear in the 1990s that, when Eastern European and Asian governments were knocking on our doors, they did not only want Israeli high tech but they also wanted to take advantage of our connection to Washington? Israel's strong alliance with the United States is not only a result of its strategic value. It also has to do with the vigour of the American Jewish community. Beilin, so eager to give up the Jordan Valley, which has hardly any Palestinian population and has been seen as a strategic asset even by Labour leaders, was also in a rush to forgo the strategic value of American Jewry.

Our sages warned us against arrogance. In Ethics, this attitude was recognized as befitting Balam, not Abraham. Yet, many Israelis, particularly those on the left, ignored or belittled the importance of Palestinian anti-Israeli, and even anti-Jewish, incitement in the PA's electronic and written media.

Dinner at Camp David, July 2000, the peace talks that failed

Anyone who drew attention to these horrifying and devastating messages in the Palestinian media and education system was immediately labelled a warmonger, or they were called "people of yesterday," Peres' favourite catch phrase for those who criticized his "new Middle East."

The complacency of some people in the academic world was no less shocking. Why were they not ready to listen to critics from among their own colleagues who warned them against disregarding the anti-Israeli propaganda in the Palestinian media and education system? Why did they defend Arafat when he was calling for a jihad against Israel in the midst of the peace process?

Arafat's performance and the Israeli left's arrogance are reasons for the political upset in Israeli politics. Prime Minister Ariel Sharon could never have made a political comeback without Arafat's help and the disgrace of the left. The Lebanon stigma that accompanied Sharon, whether correct or not, was adequate to discount him as a serious contender for prime minister.

However, Sharon not only won the 2001 election, he has remained high in the polls, despite his inability to deliver on his campaign promise of "peace with security." Sharon has learned from his past mistakes. He worked hard to create a consensus supporting his national security policy. Yet, the country still had to endure many casualties to fully mobilize behind him. He stays away from frequent appearances in the electronic media. Nevertheless, he has succeeded in mobilizing Israeli public support for steadfastness in the war and in creating an environment of confidence in his leadership. But ultimately it is Arafat and the Israeli left that have assisted most in boosting Sharon's popularity.

The current Israeli mood is reminiscent of the feelings of frustration and resentment after the Yom Kippur war in 1973. Many Israelis felt the behaviour of the international community towards Israel at that time was outrageous. Many believed Israel abstained from striking first, as it had done in 1967, because of world public opinion. The country paid dearly in terms of casualties and was rewarded with a UN resolution that equated Zionism with racism. Arafat was also invited to the UN to address the General Assembly in his uniform wearing a gun, warning the world to accept his proposals or else suffer the consequences.

The Israeli public's reaction to this was the defeat of the Labour government and the election, for the first time in Israel's history, of a Likud government, led by Menachem Begin. It was during these years that Gush Emunim, the settler movement in Judea and Samaria, became popular and was seen as the new Zionist vanguard. It was not until the early 1990s that then-U.S. president George Bush pushed for the repeal of the UN resolution equating Zionism and racism, a small step that also helped contribute to the Oslo process.

Many Israelis feel betrayed today by an international community that accuses Israel of starting a war that Arafat imposed on it. The feeling that the whole world seems to be against us is prevalent in the street. Most Israelis feel today that after Arafat rejected the most generous land-for-peace proposal ever offered to the Palestinians – not only by an Israeli prime minister, but also by their own brethren Arab states – that Arafat's real end-game is not only a Palestinian state but the destruction of the State of Israel.

Instead of a compromise with the Palestinians, the Europeans and other "lovers of Zion" are bringing out a new wave of rigid attitudes. Sharon has remarked that nobody calls him to inquire about Israel's wounded and new orphans – they call to check how Arafat is doing. The feeling one gets is that the enlightened world again does not care when Jews are being murdered. It is easier to blame their fate on them. However, today we have a Jewish state to defend the Jewish people. As I reflect on that state, with all the political difficulties we face, the fact remains that Israel exists as a strong and free democracy. We have come a long way since the dark days before the state existed. Today is our 54th Independence Day.

Israel's way of fighting terror

ISRAEL Under Attack
CJN FOCUS

By GAL LUFT

Just like in the case of the war against car accidents, the war against terrorism is a frustrating endeavour: one can never establish the number of terrorist acts that have been prevented, only those in which prevention failed.

In the past several months, Israeli security forces have succeeded in foiling dozens of attempts by Palestinian human bombs to enter Israel's main cities and cause terror and carnage. According to the head of the Israeli Shin Bet security agency, Avi Dichter, up to 80 per cent of Palestinian suicide attacks have been prevented. One can only imagine what the Middle East would look like had the terrorists been more competent.

But even a Palestinian success rate of 20 per cent is still too high to bear. In March alone, Palestinian terrorism rocked Israel's main cities 12 times, killing 70 and wounding 548. This is something no country in the world could tolerate. Israel decided to take off the gloves and do exactly what Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat had said he would do but failed to deliver: eliminate the Palestinian centres of terror. On March 28, hundreds of Israeli tanks and armoured personnel carriers rolled into six Palestinian-controlled cities. One by one, Ramallah, Kalkilya, Tulkarem, Bethlehem, Nablus and Jenin were seized by the Israel Defense Forces (IDF) as part of Operation Defensive Shield.

No sober Israeli believes the operation has succeeded in completely eradicating Palestinian terrorism. Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Fatah's Al-Aqsa Martyr Brigades can produce an inexhaustible number of human projectiles, and without some sort of physical separation between Israel and the West Bank, it is believed that the bombers will always get through. Nonetheless, the incursions into the Palestinian-controlled territories allowed Israel to seriously handicap the Palestinian terrorist infrastructure and, at least in the short term, reduce the capability of terrorist groups to recruit, arm and launch suicide bombers.

Israeli forces collected more than 5,000 illegal weapons, including anti-tank weapons, mortars, landmines and other explosives. As well, they discovered and destroyed more than 15 workshops for weapons production, and they arrested and interrogated hundreds of wanted terrorists, including the head of Tanzim, Marwan Barghouti, and other key leaders of Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

Dozens of Palestinian terrorists were also killed in the fighting. One was Qeis Odwan, commander of the Hamas military wing in the northern West Bank, who was personally responsible for several suicide bombings, including the Netanya Passover massacre, that together took 75 Israeli lives.

More importantly, the IDF's seizure of Arafat's headquarters in Ramallah enabled Israel to collect thousands of classified documents that provide ample intelligence about Arafat's terror infrastructure. Some of the documents found were signed by Arafat, highlighting his personal knowledge of, and complicity in, terrorist acts perpetrated by members of his own Fatah faction. The information collected will enable Israeli security forces to conduct future counter-terrorist operations with greater vigour and effectiveness.

Israel's operation in the West Bank was not well received by the international community. Many critics claimed the IDF used excessive force, caused a great deal of destruction, refused to open the cities to journalists and humanitarian aid workers and failed to uphold international humanitarian law.

The IDF in Jenin

Most of the attention went to the battle in the Jenin refugee camp – one square kilometre inhabited by more than 15,000 people, all living in poverty and neglect – where for nine days, Israeli soldiers clashed with hundreds of militants who used the local population as human shields. The battle in the camp was fierce. Twenty-three Israeli soldiers and about 100 Palestinians were killed there. Some Arabs have already characterized the battle as the "Palestinian Masada," and Palestinian spokespeople have repeatedly referred to events in the camp as a "massacre," equating it to the 1982 Sabra and Shatila bloodbath for which Israel's current prime minister, Ariel Sharon, was found indirectly responsible.

The allegations of a massacre are demonstrably false and reflect a misunderstanding of the challenges and complexities of fighting in densely populated urban terrain. Urban warfare is the most difficult and costly type of warfare for any military organization. Stalingrad, Grozny, Beirut and Belfast are a few examples of the places where militaries have learned the hard way about the perils of war in hostile urban territory.

Those who find it hard to visualize what fighting in such an environment is about can watch the recent movie Black Hawk Down, which depicts the ordeal of U.S. forces in Mogadishu in October 1993. There, American soldiers killed several hundred Somali militiamen and civilians and wounded more than 1,000 in just one day of fighting in an effort to rescue U.S troops pinned down during the failed attempt to snatch the lieutenants of Somali warlord Mohammad Farah Aideed. Russian soldiers who fought against Chechen rebels in Grozny in 1994 were even more merciless. They preferred to reduce the city to rubble with artillery and air power rather than pay the price involved in street fighting.

For Israel, this option never existed. The entry into the Palestinian cities was done with the understanding that inflicting a heavy toll on the Palestinian population would not serve Israel's interests. The purpose of the operation was to act against terrorists, not innocent civilians. To limit the civilian death toll, the IDF opted for a long and complicated house-to-house ground assault, thus putting its own troops in considerable danger.

The claim that Israel killed a high number of innocent civilians is refutable. In the reality in the West Bank, the definition of "innocent civilian" is not at all clear. Firstly, who is a civilian? Palestinian spokespeople define civilians as those who wear civilian clothes. According to this characterization, all members of Al Qaeda and the Taliban in Afghanistan were civilians. Each of the Palestinian cities was defended by thousands of armed and trained Fatah members, as well as members of the official plain-clothed Palestinian security forces. They were equipped with assault rifles, anti-tank weapons, hand grenades, mortars, sniper rifles, landmines and machine guns. Although many of them look like regular civilians, they were considered by the IDF to be legitimate targets. Regardless, they were given a chance to surrender before the IDF moved into their neighbourhoods. Many who refused to surrender condemned themselves to death. The majority of them died with either a gun in their hands or an explosive belt strapped to their bodies.

The IDF in Bethlehem

Another dilemma faced by Israeli forces was who is a terrorist and who embodies the "infrastructure of terrorism"? The Palestinian population in the camps is completely mobilized to the war effort and harbours a strong urge for vengeance for what they perceive to be Israeli aggression. Men, women and children were working indefatigably to prepare their camp for the IDF's arrival. They planted hundreds of explosive devices, booby traps and other obstacles in their streets and homes, making every car, alley, gate or room a potential bombing scene. One such bomb killed 13 Israeli soldiers in Jenin.

The IDF operated under strict instructions to use force only against those who imposed a direct threat to the soldiers and to take severe action against anybody associated with terrorist activity. Life, however, is not black and white. Is a 70-year-old woman sewing explosive belts to be used by suicide bombers part of the infrastructure of terror? And what about the 15-year-old girl who mixes alcohol and other chemicals in her kitchen for the purpose of making explosives? Or the blind old imam who preaches to youth about the virtues of martyrdom? Should they be treated as terrorists? Should they be arrested? Killed? Expelled? These are some of the dilemmas soldiers fighting such a war face.

There are no textbooks or field manuals that could provide a clear answer to all the situations soldiers might face on the ground. Admittedly, even the most humanitarian and experienced soldiers are prone to panic and could make the wrong judgment when trapped in a maze of dark alleys and surrounded by a hostile population. One Israeli soldier reported how he shot a young man who advanced toward him and did not respond to a call to stop. The Israeli, who feared the man was about to blow himself up, discovered later that he was mentally retarded. "I really felt bad about the incident, but once I thought about my friends who were killed in the suicide attack on the bus in Haifa, my remorse dissipated," the soldier said.

War is never a pretty undertaking. "Nothing except a battle lost can be half as melancholy as a battle won," the Duke of Wellington once said after a bloody battle. And indeed many Israelis, who see the devastated streets of Jenin on television, feel this way. There is no elation for the Palestinians' loss, nor there is any illusion that it is the IDF's last visit to Jenin and other West Bank cities, but there is a strong conviction among Israelis that in what many now call "the continuation of Israel's war of independence," a battle lost is not an option.

The terror and the pity: Yasser Arafat and the second loss of Palestine

By BARRY RUBIN

As has happened so often before, some observers have underestimated Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's ability to survive political or military disasters largely of his own making. Others have overestimated his willingness to make peace or his ability to change his positions. This article presents a long-term view of Arafat's leadership and a short-term analysis on the current state of Palestinian politics.

In 2000, Arafat and the Palestinian leadership initiated a new, self-inflicted "nakba," a catastrophe equalled only by the 1948 Arab defeat. The decision to reject a negotiated solution building on the Oslo peace process, the Camp David proposals and the Clinton proposals constituted nothing less than a second, and long-term, loss of the chance to achieve a Palestinian state. Whatever rationales can be made for this choice, the cost already incurred by the Palestinian people – only a small part of the ultimate price – vastly exceeds any of these decisions supposed reasons and certainly any likely benefits to be achieved.

This debacle was brought about by the same Palestinian leadership and thinking that had contributed to other, earlier disasters, such as those in 1967 (the provocation and loss of war with Israel), 1970 (the PLO's defeat and expulsion from Jordan), 1978 (failure to use the opportunity afforded by the Egypt-Israel Camp David agreements), 1982 (the PLO's defeat by Israel in Lebanon), 1983 (the defeat by Syria in Lebanon), 1988 (the inability to make a major policy shift toward negotiations), 1990 (the sacrifice of the U.S.-PLO dialogue and Arafat's decision to back Iraq in the Kuwait crisis) and others.

Yasser Arafat: The Man Who Threw Away Palestine

One could claim that the reason the Palestinian movement exists and the Palestinian issue has so much visibility today is because of Arafat. But one could argue even more effectively that the reason there is no Palestinian state and so many Palestinian casualties today is also because of Arafat.

During a career spanning more than 35 years, Arafat has led the Palestinian revolution. But where has he led it? His strategies have included:

• An effort to involve the Arab states in war with Israel that played some small role in creating the Arab defeat of the 1967 war.

• An attempt to launch a guerrilla/terrorist war in the West Bank and Gaza Strip immediately after the 1967 war, which quickly failed.

• A campaign to attack Israel from Jordan using terrorist methods that did not lead anywhere militarily. Meanwhile, Arafat's increasing intervention in Jordanian politics, and tolerance for the even more extreme revolutionary efforts of his more radical Palestinian allies, led to a crushing and bloody defeat in 1970 at the hands of the Jordanian army.

• Fatah and the PLO's involvement in international terrorism in the early 1970s with Arafat's authorization, partly under the "Black September" front group, further discredited the Palestinian cause and undermined western sympathy for it.

• A campaign to use terror to attack Israel from Lebanon during the 1970s seemed to base PLO strategy mainly on the murder of as many Israeli civilians as possible.

• At the same time, increased PLO meddling in Lebanese politics played a role in intensifying the civil war there. Arafat's military build-up in Lebanon, his cross-border terrorism and his terrorism against Israeli targets worldwide contributed to the 1982 Israeli attack that led to his expulsion from Beirut.

• Discontent within the PLO, inflamed by Syrian backing, then led to a revolt against Arafat, which produced his second expulsion from Lebanon in 1983.

• Arafat's political hesitations in 1988 almost lost the PLO the opportunity for a dialogue with the United States, and Arafat's backing of continued terror forced even the reluctant U.S. State Department to break off the dialogue in 1990.

• Arafat's backing of Iraq's invasion of Kuwait in 1990 antagonized his main benefactors among the Gulf Emirates to the point where they cut off aid, or redirected aid to Arafat's main rivals in the West Bank and Gaza, including Hamas. More than 300,000 Palestinians were expelled from Kuwait or were forced to flee Iraq as a result of the ensuing crisis.

Arafat addressing his public last year

• While Arafat did sign the 1993 Oslo agreements and began a peace process with Israel, enormous shortcomings in his implementation of the arrangements helped delay and weaken progress. He never prepared or mobilized Palestinians toward a compromise agreement, nor did he try to build strong Palestinian infrastructure and institutions as a basis for creating a viable state.

• Faced with far-reaching offers at the Camp David summit and the Clinton plan in 2000, Arafat rejected these proposals as a basis for negotiation.

• Whether or not he played a direct role in the outbreak of violence, he quickly supported, organized and tolerated a massive increase in terrorism. He had launched an unwinnable war that would ultimately destroy the Palestinian infrastructure, any serious support for a compromise agreement in Israel, and his backing in the West, without bringing any real help from the Arab world.

• He rejected several ceasefire opportunities and did not seriously implement his own initiatives. Even when the Sept. 11 terror attacks on the United States offered him tremendous potential leverage in returning to the bargaining table and "joining" the war against terrorism, he threw away this chance. The case of the PA's Karine-A weapons ship was only one example. Indeed, if Arafat had succeeded and the tons of Iranian-supplied offensive arms had arrived, triggering a full-scale war, Arafat and the Palestinians would have been far worse off.

Second, there have been Arafat's own shortcomings as a leader, including:

• His inability and unwillingness to undertake the full transition of organization, ideology and institutions necessary to achieve a clear acceptance of a permanent two-state solution with Israel.

• His persistent patterns of encouraging or permitting chaos and violence while disclaiming responsibility for these situations.

• His refusal to do more to centralize the Palestinian movement and his tolerance of the destabilizing actions of radical groups as long as he thought they served his purpose. Nevertheless, he miscalculated and let more extremist elements undermine his position, as happened in the past in Lebanon and Jordan.

• His failure to show an interest in anything but high politics and armed struggle indicated his disdain for the kind of economic, educational, institution-building and other kinds of activities needed to achieve a viable state.

These problems were almost, but not quite, balanced by Arafat's brilliance at international public relations. His combination of promises, creativity with facts and conspiracy theories worked well in the short- to medium-run, but always caught up to him in the end.

In short, his image-building efforts were undermined by his actual policies. The carefully cultivated theme of Palestinians as "victims," "underdogs" who deserve the world's pity and help was overwhelmed by that of the Palestinians' image as ruthless suicide terrorists. The theme of moderation – "Palestinians just want to end occupation and have their own homeland" – was repeatedly destroyed by the theme of militancy – excessive demands and the thinly-veiled goal of destroying Israel. The idea that Arafat is sincere, or at least a potential realist, was betrayed by his visible lack of credibility and flexibility.

Several other persistent problems endemic in the Palestinian movement have also contributed to this tragic story. One of these has been a profound misunderstanding of Israel by Arafat, his colleagues and much of the Palestinian public. On one hand, they have argued that Israel's existence was like the Christian Crusades, a temporary conquest of Palestine doomed to inevitable destruction by Islamic forces led by a modern-day Saladin (Arafat). Israel was an artificial entity; the Jews were not a nation and had no right to the land. Zionism was the personification of evil, a new version of colonialism, a drive for world conquest.

The weapons from the Karine-A

Arafat has always seen himself to be a general rather than a president. Palestine, he said from the beginning, could be recovered only "by blood and iron; and blood and iron have nothing to do with philosophies and theories." He had contempt for politicians: "It is the commandos who will decide the future." His whole career has been built on projecting an image of being a fighter, rejecting prospective alternative roles as a bureaucratic administrator, a politician preaching the art of the possible, or a diplomat favouring unpalatable compromises to achieve a portion of his goal.

Arafat sees violence as the glue holding the Palestinian movement together and building it further. "Armed struggle restores a lost personal and national identity, an identity taken away by force which can only be restored by force. Palestine had been taken away by fire and steel, and it will be recovered by fire and steel," he has declared.

It was anti-civilian violence that the PLO thought would bring about Israel's collapse or, in Fatah's more modest immediate goal in the revolutionary war of independence begun in 2000, produce Israel's unconditional withdrawal from the territories. Such attacks, the PLO magazine Filastin al-Thawra explained way back in 1970, would make each Israeli feel "isolated and defenseless against the Arab soldier in his house, on his land, on the road, in the café, in the movie theatre, in army camps and everywhere." Each Israeli would then be bound to value more highly "the life of stability and repose that he enjoyed in his former country" compared to "the life of confusion and anxiety he finds in the land of Palestine. This is bound to motivate him towards reverse immigration."

This assessment of the Israeli collective psyche, and hence of how the Palestinians would achieve victory, was quite mistaken. Arafat consistently miscalculated the balance of forces. He believed that Palestinian steadfastness plus Israel's weakness plus Arab intervention plus international sympathy would overcome his side's lesser military, economic and technological power.

Even when Palestinian internal politics and opportunities were transformed, the leader did not change his ideas, style or assumptions to take advantage or adjust to these changed circumstances. Instead, he promoted a strategy that guaranteed deadlock, defeat and bloodshed. Western observers could simply not believe that such a situation, which ran counter to the behaviour of other movements and leaders as well as the principles of realpolitik, could be happening. Surely, they thought, if Arafat was given one more chance, or one more concession, or if there was one more turn of events, everything would change. This view has proven almost as mistaken over the last 30 years as has Arafat's own strategy.

In his post-Oslo, "al-Aqsa intifadah" phase, Arafat has increasingly depended on two groups – the "Veteran Radicals" or "Outsiders" (that is, those Palestinians who originally came from what is now Israel but who had joined Arafat in years of exile) and West Bank Fatah militants who reject compromise with Israel and favour a revolutionary "war of independence." This process has also led him to permit a high level of Fatah-Hamas military co-operation.

Yet the idea that these forces are threatening him or are outside of his control is also quite mistaken. While there is a debate among Israeli security services about the extent to which Arafat controls daily events in the territories, there is a consensus that no single individual or group poses a compelling threat to his leadership; the evidence also indicates that when he wants or needs to impose a greater degree of order over the diverse Palestinian factions in order to ameliorate international pressure on himself – such as after the Hamas terror wave in the spring of 1996 and following the Dolphinarium bombing in June 2001 – Arafat has done so. The problem is that Arafat has not yet been confronted with the type of sustained international pressure necessary to compel him to impose permanent order over the terrorist factions.

Arafat, then, continues to have a virtual monopoly on power in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. The areas he does not directly control or constrain exist as a result of his choice and not of the imposition of other powerful forces or the overwhelming demands of public opinion.

As a way of bettering the condition of the Palestinian people or of obtaining an independent Palestinian state, Arafat's strategy now and in the past has been disastrous. In terms of making the activists (and often the masses) feel proud and successful, keeping the movement united, and maintaining his own leadership, however, Arafat's strategy has been a great success. This fatal combination of ingredients seems unlikely to change now or for some time to come.

Security Council Resolution 242

Following the Six Day War in June 1967, the heads of Arab states met in August at Khartoum, Sudan, and issued a statement which included the declaration: "no peace with Israel, no negotiations with Israel, no recognition of Israel." The Security Council of the United Nations, in an attempt to initiate indirect negotiations with the objective of promoting peace and recognition, passed Resolution 242.

The French text of the Resolution refers to "the territories" in Section 1(i), and this has been interpreted by some to mean "all the territories." However, both the United States and British delegates to the Security Council have made statements that the wording was specifically chosen so as not to mean "all" the territories.

Following the October War in 1973, the Security Council passed Resolution 338 which added to Resolution 242 the requirement of negotiations between the parties.

Emphasizing further that all member states in their acceptance of the Charter of the United Nations have undertaken a commitment to act in accordance with Article 2 of the Charter.

1. Affirms that the fulfilment of Charter principles requires the establishment of a just and lasting peace in the Middle East which should include the application of both the following principles:

(i) Withdrawal of Israeli armed forces from territories occupied in the recent conflict.

(ii) Termination of all claims or states of belligerency and respect for and acknowledgement of the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of every state in the area and their right to live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries free from threats or acts of force.

2. Affirms further the necessity

(a) For guaranteeing freedom of navigation through international waterways in the area;

(b) For achieving a just settlement of the refugee problem;

(c) For guaranteeing the territorial inviolability and political independence of every state in the area, through measures including the establishment of demilitarized zones.

3. Requests the Secretary General to designate a special representative to proceed to the Middle East to establish and maintain contacts with the states concerned in order to promote agreement and assist efforts to achieve a peaceful and accepted settlement in accordance with the provisions and principles in this resolution;

4. Requests the Secretary General to report to the Security Council on the progress of the efforts of the special representative as soon as possible.

Timeline after Camp David July 2000

By MITCHELL DANOW
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

The Palestinian intifadah has now raged for a year and a half. During that time, periods of escalating violence have been punctuated by occasional attempts at diplomacy and short-lived ceasefires.

On Jaffa Road in Jerusalem

Following are some of the highlights of the seemingly intractable Israeli-Palestinian conflict:

• Sept. 28, 2000 – Some 30 Israeli policemen are wounded on Jerusalem's Temple Mount when angry Palestinian demonstrators attack them with stones. The confrontation follows a controversial visit to the site by Likud party leader Ariel Sharon and a group of Likud Knesset members. Hours later, similar clashes erupt in the West Bank town of Ramallah.

• Sept. 30, 2000 – A 12-year-old-boy, Mohammad al-Darrah, is killed in his father's arms when they are caught in the middle of a firefight in the Gaza Strip. Video footage of the incident inflames rioting Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, and prompts similar riots in October by Israeli Arabs living within Israel's borders. Subsequent forensic tests by a German news station disclose that the boy was killed by Palestinian fire.

• Oct. 4, 2000 – Israeli and Palestinian leaders agree to a limited ceasefire during 10 hours of talks in Paris that bring together Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak, Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat and U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright. The ceasefire lasts only hours.

• Oct. 7, 2000 – Israel's army withdraws from Joseph's Tomb in Nablus after Palestinian security officials give assurances that they will protect the site. Within hours, a Palestinian mob destroys the Jewish holy site. In another incident that day, Hezbollah gunmen kidnap three Israeli soldiers, Staff-Sgt. Avraham Binyamin, Staff-Sgt. Omar Suad and Sgt. Adi Avitan.

• Oct. 12, 2000 – Two Israeli reservists are killed and their bodies disfigured by a Palestinian mob in the West Bank town of Ramallah. For the first time, Israel retaliates with helicopter strikes on Palestinian command posts in Ramallah and Gaza City.

• Oct. 16-17, 2000 – U.S. President Bill Clinton and UN Secretary General Kofi Annan join leaders from the Middle East for a summit in the Egyptian resort of Sharm al Sheikh. Israeli and Palestinian leaders agree to a ceasefire, but it collapses within days.

• Nov. 9, 2000 – Israeli helicopter gunships assassinate Hussein Abayad, a leading member of the Palestinians' Tanzim militia, inaugurating the Israeli policy of "targeted killings."

• Dec. 10, 2000 – Barak resigns, following his surprise announcement the previous night that he would seek a new mandate from the people to pursue his peace policies with the Palestinians.

In Tel Aviv

• Dec. 11, 2000 – A U.S.-led panel under former senator George Mitchell begins probing the causes of the Israeli-Palestinian violence.

• Jan. 21-27, 2001 – Israeli-Palestinian peace talks are held at the Egyptian Red Sea resort of Taba.

• Feb. 6, 2001 – Ariel Sharon is elected prime minister by a landslide over Barak.

• May 18, 2001 – A suicide bomber kills five people in a crowded shopping mall in Netanya, and Israel responds by launching its first jet strikes on the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

• May 21, 2001 – The U.S.-led Mitchell Commission formally issues its report, calling for an immediate ceasefire followed

'No right of return'

The following letter to the editor was published in the Jerusalem Post in August 1989. Its author was Israel's Foreign Minister during the Six Day War and has served as Israel's ambassador to the United States and the United Nations.

Sir,

There is a persistent discussion in the media and in speeches by Palestinian spokesmen about what is called a "right of return."

This point should not need much discussion for the simple reason that no such "right" exists. The very term "right of return" has never featured in an internationally binding document.

Insofar as Israel is concerned, its status is governed by Resolution 273(III) of the General Assembly (May 11, 1949) dealing with admission to the United Nations and "taking note of the declarations and explanations of the representative of the Government of Israel before the ad hoc Political Committee of the General Assembly." This is the only occasion on which the admission of a state has been related to speeches by an applicant. In those "declarations and explanations," I made it clear that the admission of refugees was a matter for Israel's sovereign discretion and was not subject to legal constraints.

Membership in the United Nations is based on the principle of the "sovereign equality of all its members." This means that Israel's control of entry to its territory is equivalent to that of the United States, the USSR, Egypt or any of the other 150 and more member states.

In December 1949, the General Assembly of the United Nations made a recommendation about the return of refugees, but this was described as a matter subject to "permission," not as a matter of "right." Moreover, on February 24, 1947, the permanent members of the Security Council determined that a General Assembly resolution does not create international obligations. All the Arab states concurred in this finding.

The conclusion is that entry into Israel is something that individuals or groups outside Israel have a right to request and that Israel has a sovereign right to accept or reject.

What I have written here applies to all territories in which Israeli law and jurisdiction are or will be in force.

by a cooling-off period and a series of confidence-building steps, as Sharon announces a unilateral Israeli ceasefire.

• June 1, 2001 – A suicide bomber kills 21 Israelis and wounds more than 100 others at a Tel Aviv beachside disco, and Sharon abandons the unilateral ceasefire.

• June 12, 2001 – Israel and the Palestinian Authority accept CIA director George Tenet's proposal for a lasting ceasefire in the Middle East, but Palestinian attacks resume the following day.

• Aug. 9, 2001 – Fifteen people are killed and more than 130 wounded in a suicide bombing at Sbarro's pizzeria in downtown Jerusalem.

• Sept. 11, 2001 – Thousands of Palestinians celebrate the terror attacks in the United States, chanting "God is great."

• Sept. 18, 2001 – Following intense international pressure after the previous week's terror attacks in New York and Washington, Arafat declares a ceasefire, and Israel responds by pulling its tanks from Palestinian cities in the West Bank.

At the Dolphinarium in Tel Aviv

• Oct. 17, 2001 – Gunmen from the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestinian, a PLO faction, assassinate Israeli Tourism Minister Rehavam Ze'evi, and Israel responds by sending troops into six Palestinian cities in the West Bank.

• Nov. 10, 2001 – President George W. Bush speaks of "Palestine" as a future state during an address before the UN General Assembly in New York.

• Nov. 19, 2001 – Secretary of State Colin Powell signals reinvigorated U.S. involvement in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict during a speech at the University of Louisville in Kentucky.

• Nov. 26, 2001 – U.S. mediator Anthony Zinni starts a visit to the Middle East in an effort to bring about an Israeli-Palestinian ceasefire.

• Dec. 1-2, 2001 – Eleven people are killed when two suicide bombers detonate bombs on Ben Yehuda Street in Jerusalem, and 15 are killed when a suicide bomber blows up a bus in Haifa.

• Dec. 12, 2001 – Israel's cabinet cuts off all contact with Arafat, saying his failure to take serious action to stop Palestinian terror renders him "no longer relevant" to Israel.

• Dec. 16, 2001 – Zinni returns to the United States for consultations.

• Dec. 17, 2001 – Palestinian gunmen ignore a call for a ceasefire issued a day earlier by Arafat.

• Dec. 22, 2001 – Israel refuses to let Arafat attend Christmas services in Bethlehem unless he arrests those responsible for the October assassination of Ze'evi.

• Jan. 6, 2002 – Israel displays a weapons cache it captured three days earlier aboard a ship, the Karine-A, bound for the Palestinian Authority from Iran.

• Jan. 7, 2002 – Zinni ends his second mission to the region.

Why Arafat must be removed

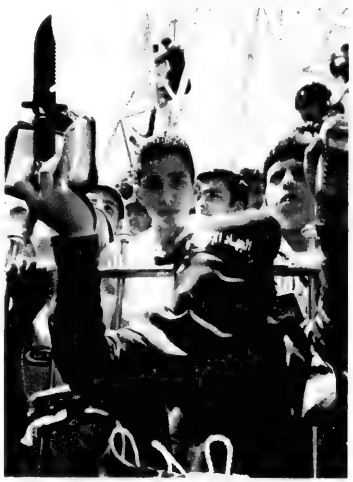
ISRAEL Under Attack CJN FOCUS

By HILLEL FRISCH

The Hamas monthly published in London, Filastin al-Muslima, is obligatory reading for every scholar of Palestinian affairs. Yet no matter how routine the exercise of reading it, nothing seems to efface the chilling effect of its 60 pages which a format and finish that can compete with the standards set by the most sophisticated weekly magazines only seems to augment.

The special sense of shock hardly lies in the details. Regretfully, one gets used to the gory visual graphic and literary celebration of the latest suicide bombings or the series of pictures of Israelis, especially soldiers, weeping over their loved ones at funerals, with a caption promising that this is only the beginning. The horror lies not in what fills the pages but in the realization of what they do not contain. Though Filastin al-Muslima purports to be a magazine of Islamic affairs, there is hardly any mention of compassion, charity, religious philosophy and ethics or even of Islamic law. As incredible as it may sound, I could not find one quote from the Koran in the latest issue, certainly not one that celebrates man created in God's vision rather than one calling for his destruction.

What is chilling, then, is the systematic effacement of any message, teaching, inspirational verse, phrase or poem that has made Islam one of mankind's truly great religions and the inspiration of one of its great civilizations. There is only one other historic example of such a systematic obliteration of a great civilization and its replacement by an overwhelming and obsessive focus on murder and destruction in contemporary history. It is fascism.



Hamas youth

Fascist thought celebrated violence, among other reasons, in order to defend western civilization. This was an ironic and tragic twist of history. After all, it may be argued that western civilization's greatest accomplishment to date must certainly lie in the countless efforts, from the Magna Carta to the American Bill of Rights, to curb and restrain power and violence in the name of liberal freedom and human and civil rights. It was no coincidence that the fascists turned liberalism into their mortal enemy, fought champions of civic freedoms in the street and then allied with Nazism to root out the Judeo-Christian ethic.

Like the fascists, Hamas fundamentalists are brutally impoverishing the civilization and religion they are purportedly defending. Islamic civilization was great in its civility – for its rule of law, for the compassion and charity of its institutions and for its tolerance of minorities. Well into modern history, those who sought refuge found it more likely in the Muslim East than in the West. The golden age of Islam was a golden age for its Christian and Jewish inhabitants as well. Certainly, Islamic kings, caliphs, sultans and princes engaged in war, but it was a war with a clear set of rules. Non-combatants, men, women and children, for the most part, were spared its horrors. Suicide missions were condemned and war was hardly the sole or predominant function of Islamic civilization. It was easily eclipsed by more salutary accomplishments – the restoration of Greek sciences, the cultivation of the arts and architecture that focused mostly, but not exclusively, on mosques in which men were inspired to Islam's lofty ideals, laws and practices.

To substitute all of this for the murder and destruction of hundreds of Israeli citizens, one of whom was a Muslim citizen of the State of Israel, should seem outrageous not only to an outsider but to the Palestinian Muslim fundamentalists themselves. How could they be willing to give up the soul of Islam for the sake of several hundred Israelis? Is this not the sweetest victory they can give to the Israelis whom they feel, erroneously, pine for Islam's downfall? And will not wanton and debauched violence eventually spill over into larger Palestinian society as the warriors take on the Palestinian infidels, or, as in the case of Afghanistan, the warriors begin to kill each other?

Even more baffling is why Palestinan Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat has chosen to tread the path of terror and war by allying with these fundamentalists in the recent war against Israel. Many of Arafat's advisors, including Abu Mazin, the architect of the initial secret discussions that led to the Oslo peace process, and two of his chief lieutenants, Muhammad Dahlan and Jibril Rajoub, who head preventive security, the largest of Arafat's dozen or more security branches, have been asking the same question.

Rajoub, the head of preventive security in the West Bank, took a blow in the face from Arafat when he did not prevent the release of the Hamas activists Arafat sometimes imprisons to appease the United States when it says he is not doing much against terrorism. Rajoub reportedly did not defend the prison as a way of protesting the alliance between Arafat's Fatah movement and the Islamic movements of Hamas and Jihad.

Hamas militia

These Palestinian officials opposed Arafat's alliance with the fundamentalists in the past for several reasons. Resigned to Arafat's divide and rule policies within the PA, they feared that extending the game to include movements who in the end seek to undermine it threatens the internal staying power of the institution on which they staked their claim. The alliance also threatens the prospects of these officials to succeed the aging and sickly leader.

As well, through this alliance, Arafat has sanctioned terrorist attacks within Israel. By contrast, these officials, advisors and intellectuals wanted to limit terrorism to the West Bank and Gaza, in the hopes that this would cause a split between Israel's left and right and lead to the downfall of Israel's unity government. Such an outcome would lead in turn to a possible centre and centre-left victory in the following Israeli elections and to further concessions for the Palestinians. They reasoned, probably correctly, that indiscriminate terror would unify the Israeli population. Escalating terror, they feared, would lead to an escalated and increasingly punishing Israeli response. They also reasoned that after Sept. 11, the net benefits of terrorism were growing smaller as the United States became more determined to fight terror linked to what U.S. President George W. Bush called the "axis of evil" – North Korea, Iraq and Iran. The Israeli capture of the ship Karine-A, laden with arms from Iran for the PA, and the discovery of mortars and equipment in the territories themselves from Iraq, clearly demonstrated the links the PA had with two of the three states.

Despite the advice of his officials, Arafat clearly took the radical path. For starters, he sanctioned the establishment of Fatah Tanzim cells with a more embellished Islamic name – the Al-Aqsa Martyr Brigades. Not only was it a more Islamic name than Tanzim, which means apparatus, but the organizational unit echoed the Hamas' Izz al-Din al-Qassam brigades as well. Their logo, obviously enough, was the al-Aqsa mosque where hostilities in this terror war first started. Increasingly, the al-Aqsa brigades adopted the same tactics as Hamas and Islamic Jihad, including suicide bombings, as well as conducting joint attacks against Israeli civilians and military personnel both within Israel and the territories. The al-Aqsa Martyr Brigades, abetted by personnel from Arafat's security forces, are responsible for 70 per cent of Israeli fatalities.

If these officials and at least one Palestinian advisor and scholar were so right, why did Arafat not heed his officials' advice? The same question may be why Arafat sided with Saddam Hussein in 1990, joined forces with radical Lebanese to destroy the Lebanese state in the 1970s and 1980s, and headed the coalition of Palestinian factions to do much the same to Jordan in the years 1968-1971. The end of each of these episodes not only spelled hardship for the state involved, but disaster for the very people Arafat leads. Jordan was forced to adopt more discriminatory policies against its Palestinian citizens for fear that some might be infiltrated by Palestinian organizations, even though most of them remained loyal to the state during the 1970s war against the factions. In Lebanon, the Palestinian community was virtually destroyed, and in 1990/91, tens of thousands of Palestinians paid for Arafat's radical policies with mass expulsion from the Gulf states that were the victims of Iraq's wrath. It is said of Arafat that he has never missed an opportunity to miss an opportunity for making peace. It would probably be as correct to say that he never missed transforming an opportunity for aggrandizing himself at the expense of fellow Palestinians.

Obviously, Arafat's follies form a pattern rather than a puzzle, and being a pattern, one must assume deep underlying causes behind them. Ziyad Abu Amer, a former scholar at Birzeit University and now a member of the Palestinian legislative council, provides one possible explanation. In a book on the sources of Palestinian nationalism, he focuses on the close linkages between the founders of the PLO, Arafat included, and the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt during these leaders' formative years. The Muslim Brotherhood is an organization that provided the ideology and inspiration for most of the radical Islamic movements of which we in the West have become painfully aware. And just as these organizations must be rooted out, a policy adopted not only in the West but by moderate Arab states as well, so too does Arafat deserve the same fate. Any other alternative will harm the Palestinians and Islamic society, which Arafat is purportedly defending just as fascist leaders did in a different era and setting.

Waging war over Jerusalem

ISRAEL Under Attack CJN FOCUS

By HERB KEINON
Special to The CJN

With a war raging, with fear in the streets, with the reserves mobilized, with a pre-June-1967-like feeling of isolation gripping Israel, it is difficult to remember what preoccupied the country in September 2000, just prior to the outbreak of the current intifadah.

Then the major diplomatic concern was not the outbreak of a war with the Palestinians, but whether Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat would unilaterally declare a state, and how Israel would respond.

It all seems so distant now, even somewhat quaint.

At the time, the main option Israel was considering in the event of an Arafat declaration of statehood was the unilateral annexation of areas deemed essential for security.

Israeli and Palestinian negotiators regularly met, in those days, around tables laden with fruit and mineral water. Few Israeli officials dreamed they would soon be trying to figure out how to pressure Arafat into keeping his minions from blowing up bar and bat mitzvah parties.

Levelling the Jenin refugee camp was a plan in the bottom of a drawer in the Central Command somewhere, not something anyone realistically thought Israel would have to do some 19 months later.

Perhaps the most telling aspect of this recollection is that the reason the Palestinians gave in September 2000 for igniting the violence had nothing to do with their threat to declare a state. The world, at the time, would have had difficulty understanding a Palestinian war for statehood, just weeks after then Prime Minister Ehud Barak offered them – and they turned down – a state on some 95 per cent of the West Bank and Gaza.

No, the Palestinian message was not that they were turning their guns, mortars and suicide bombers on Israel over a national, secular issue like statehood. The Palestinian message was that they were waging war over the issue of the Al-Aqsa Mosque and Jerusalem.

The IDF protects the residents of Gilo

The names given military operations all over the world are often pregnant with meaning; code-words innately understood by the citizens of the nations initiating the offensive.

Witness Defensive Shield, the name of Israel's recent operation, which speaks volumes to Israelis who felt defenseless and impotent in the face of the relentless wave of suicide bombings that preceded the operation.

Or take the name given to the U.S. mission in Afghanistan: Operation Enduring Freedom. For Americans traumatized by Sept. 11, this name sums up why the military operation was launched.

In a similar way, the name Al-Aqsa intifadah speaks to Palestinians, to Israeli Arabs, to Muslims around the world.

By calling this enduring low-intensity war the Al-Aqsa intifadah, the Palestinians have Islamicized the conflict. They have turned the Palestinian-Israeli conflict from a dispute over boundaries – an assumption that has long underpinned western attempts over the years to solve it – into a religious, ideological dispute.

A territorial conflict is bridgeable, the assumption being that if you somehow repair the territorial grievance, the dispute will disappear. That was the basis of UN Security Council resolutions 242 and 338 – land for peace. That was also the assumption behind the Oslo process – Israel makes concessions to bring the territorial conflict to an end, and the Palestinians live happily ever after.

A religious conflict, however, is much more difficult to solve, fired, as it is, by passions for God.

The Palestinians, by turning this recent conflict into an Islamic one, are stoking those flames, firing those passions.

It is in this sense that Jerusalem has played a key role in the current intifadah.

Even though Jerusalem has some 200,000 Arab residents, and even though nail-laced suicide bomb after nail-laced suicide bomb has exploded in Jerusalem's crowded streets, for the Palestinians, Jerusalem's centrality to the current violence is on an ideological rather than a practical plane.

Jerusalem as the great motivator.

Paradoxically, Jerusalem's Arabs have not played an active role in this round of the century-old Israel-Arab conflict – perhaps because as Israeli citizens they have the most to lose in terms of social benefits that, conceivably, could be stripped if they engaged Israel in war.

And even though so much terror has taken place in Jerusalem because of the Palestinian desire to strike at the heart of the capital – rightly reasoning that this sends a strong message that if the capital is not safe, nowhere is safe – the centrality of Jerusalem to the intifadah from the Palestinian point of view is not necessarily an "operational" one.

Jerusalem has "starred" in the intifadah because it is the one issue that could unite the disparate parts of Palestinian society – secular and religious – as well as stir the passions of hundreds of millions of Muslims around the world.

A religious conflict, however, is much more difficult to solve, fired, as it is, by passions for God.

Jerusalem, and not the state. Jerusalem, and not the settlements. Jerusalem, and not the right of refugee return. Arafat could have chosen any of these issues as the excuse for his war. But he chose Jerusalem. And for good reason.

At Camp David, Arafat heard the Egyptians and the Saudis whisper that he had no right to compromise with Israel over Jerusalem, that Jerusalem was not his to barter. He heard this and reasoned that their support would be guaranteed if the war was launched over Jerusalem.

The conventional wisdom in Israeli intelligence circles is that the intifadah was in the planning stage for months before it broke out in September 2000. Arafat, according to this narrative, realized at Camp David two months earlier that he had gotten as much as he could through negotiations, and that anything more would have to be won through violence.

The question then became what would be the trigger. Ariel Sharon handed him that trigger when he went to the Temple Mount. Arafat could then rant that the Al-Aqsa mosque – indeed all of Haram al-Sharif (the Temple Mount) – is in danger.

His rant fell on receptive ears. Ever since the Western Wall tunnel riots in Jerusalem in 1996 – the first post-Oslo expression of organized PA violence – the Palestinians had spun conspiracy theories that the mosques on the Temple Mount were in physical danger. They claimed that two tunnels, not one, were burrowed in order to weaken the foundations of the mosques and bring them tumbling down.

Soon afterward, large conferences sprouted up both inside and outside Green Line Israel to deal with the issue. Israeli Arabs volunteered their time to come to Jerusalem and strengthen the mosques.

The fear was there. The passion was there. All that was needed was the match.

Focusing on Al-Aqsa and Jerusalem has served Arafat's purposes well. By Islamicizing the conflict, Arafat was able to bring Hamas and Islamic Jihad – his "opposition parties" – closer to him. These Islamic organizations have no enduring love for the PA or its goal of a secular state. But when Arafat waved the banner of Al-Aqsa, they responded. How could they turn their back on a modern day Saladin – as Arafat has referred to himself – fighting to free the Holy City of the infidels.

The Islamicization of the conflict has obviously made the conflict that much more intractable.

During Oslo's heyday, when the majority of Israelis believed the dispute was indeed only a territorial one, Israel was willing to make far-reaching compromises.

A nation that once declared a holiday – Jerusalem Day – to celebrate the unification of the city in 1967, was so intoxicated by Oslo that it was willing to re-divide the city and have sovereignty over its holiest site taken from its hands. Two days before the outbreak of the intifadah, Ehud Barak said in a Jerusalem Post interview that he envisioned two capitals in the city, Jerusalem for Israel, and al-Quds as the capital of a future Palestinian state.

Polls at the time indicated that more and more Israelis were willing to consider "creative" solutions to the Temple Mount – from shared sovereignty to an international umbrella to the idea that Israel would be sovereign below the ground and the Palestinians above it – if it would just bring peace.

Some in the West are saying now that in order to break out of the current impasse, Israel will have to sit down with the Palestinians at the point where the Camp David and later Taba talks broke off – including bringing up again the creative sovereignty solutions for Jerusalem.

But this will be hard to sell in post-Al-Aqsa intifadah Israel.

A stand-off between Israeli security forces and Arab rioters on the Temple Mount

With central Jerusalem turned into a war zone even while the eastern part of the city is in Israeli control, few are now easily going to agree to a situation where the eastern part of the city is taken out of Israeli hands altogether. If things are bad now, this argument runs, how much worse will they be if Israel does not control eastern Jerusalem.

If the spiritual connection to the city was not strong enough to keep many Israelis from a willingness to forfeit sovereignty over the Temple Mount, if the mantra of Jerusalem as "the united, eternal capital of the state of Israel" proved in reality more words than substance, then 19 months of watching Jerusalemites writhe in fear and pain may rid people of an inclination to compromise to have peace in the capital. At least for the time being.

Jerusalem is a city where the names of neighbourhoods and quarters often represent more than just the neighbourhoods themselves. Mea Shearim is more than just a place, it is also a buzzword for haredim. Mount Scopus is more than just where a university and hospital are located, it is a reminder of a time when the city was divided.

The newest addition to this lexicon of place names-cum-concepts is Gilo, the unfortunate neighbourhood on the city's southern outskirts that has intermittently come under rifle and mortar fire from Beit Jala, just across the wadi.

Gilo is no longer just another new Jerusalem neighbourhood, but a catchword for when-the-Palestinians-don't-get-what-they-want-they-shoot-wherever-they-can.

When Gilo was first being fired on in the early stages of the intifadah, the question was why? Why Gilo? The answer was simple. Because it was there, bordering the PA, within easy firing range.

True, there are other neighbourhoods in Jerusalem close to Arab quarters. But Israel retained security control in these other areas.

The Jerusalem neighbourhood of French Hill was not fired upon from the adjacent Arab neighbourhood of Issawiya, not because the Palestinians did not want to shoot from there, but because they simply couldn't. Israeli police patrol Issawiya. In Jerusalem, Gilo was the only neighbourhood within Kalashnikov range of a Palestinian area under Arafat's control. And, as a result, only Gilo was shot at, night after night. "All Jerusalem is Gilo" was a phrase coined soon after the firing in Gilo began, in order to express solidarity with the residents of that neighbourhood.

Arafat looked to Jerusalem in September 2000 to stir the masses for his fight against Israel. Now Israelis are likely to look to Al-Aqsa intifadah's Jerusalem as the reason why what was offered to the Palestinians in the capital before the violence cannot be offered again.

Gilo will be held up as the reason – the fear that if the Camp David and Taba formulas are recycled and implemented, all of Jerusalem could truly, and not only metaphorically, one day turn into Gilo.

THE DECLARATION OF THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE STATE OF ISRAEL

ISRAEL Under Attack CJN FOCUS

On May 14, 1948, on the day in which the British Mandate over Palestine expired, the Jewish People's Council gathered at the Tel Aviv Museum and approved the following proclamation, declaring the establishment of the State of Israel. The new state was recognized that night by the United States and three days later by the USSR.

Text of the Declaration of Independence:

Eretz Yisrael was the birthplace of the Jewish people. Here their spiritual, religious and political identity was shaped. Here they first attained statehood, created cultural values of national and universal significance and gave to the world the eternal Book of Books.

After being forcibly exiled from their land, the people kept faith with it throughout their dispersion and never ceased to pray and hope for their return to it and for the restoration in it of their political freedom.

Impelled by this historic and traditional attachment, Jews strove in every successive generation to re-establish themselves in their ancient homeland. In recent decades they returned in their masses. Pioneers and defenders, they made deserts bloom, revived the Hebrew language, built villages and towns, and created a thriving community controlling its own economy and culture, loving peace but knowing how to defend itself, bringing the blessings of progress to all the country's inhabitants, and aspiring towards independent nationhood.

In the year 5657 (1897), at the summons of the spiritual father of the Jewish State, Theodore Herzl, the First Zionist Congress convened and proclaimed the right of the Jewish people to national rebirth in its own country.

This right was recognized in the Balfour Declaration of the 2nd November, 1917, and re-affirmed in the Mandate of the League of Nations which, in particular, gave international sanction to the historic connection between the Jewish people and Eretz Yisrael and to the right of the Jewish people to rebuild its national home.

The catastrophe which recently befell the Jewish people – the massacre of millions of Jews in Europe – was another clear demonstration of the urgency of solving the problem of its homelessness by re-establishing the Jewish State in Eretz Yisrael, which would open the gates of the homeland wide to every Jew and confer upon the Jewish people the status of a fully privileged member of the comity of nations.

Survivors of the Nazi Holocaust in Europe, as well as Jews from other parts of the world, continued to migrate to Eretz Yisrael, undaunted by difficulties, restrictions and dangers, and never ceased to assert their right to a life of dignity, freedom and honest toil in their national homeland.

In the Second World War, the Jewish community of this country contributed its full share to the struggle of the freedom– and peace-loving nations against the forces of Nazi wickedness and, by the blood of its soldiers and its war effort, gained the right to be reckoned among the peoples who founded the United Nations.

On the 29th November, 1947, the United Nations General Assembly passed a resolution calling for the establishment of a Jewish State in Eretz Yisrael; the General Assembly required the inhabitants of Eretz Yisrael to take such steps as were necessary on their part for the implementation of that resolution. This recognition by the United Nations of the right of the Jewish people to establish their state is irrevocable.

This right is the natural right of the Jewish people to be masters of their own fate, like all other nations, in their own sovereign state.

Accordingly we, members of the People's Council, representatives of the Jewish community of Eretz Yisrael and of the Zionist movement, are here assembled on the day of the termination of the British Mandate over Eretz Yisrael and, by virtue of our natural and historic right and on the strength of the resolution of the United Nations General Assembly, hereby declare the establishment of a Jewish State in Eretz Yisrael, to be known as the State of Israel.

WE DECLARE that, with effect from the moment of the termination of the Mandate being tonight, the eve of Sabbath, the 6th Iyar, 5708 (15th May, 1948), until the establishment of the elected, regular authorities of the State in accordance with the Constitution which shall be adopted by the Elected Constituent Assembly no later than the 1st October 1948, the People's Council shall act as a Provisional Council of State, and its executive organ, the People's Administration, shall be the Provisional Government of the Jewish State, to be called "Israel."

THE STATE OF ISRAEL will be open for Jewish immigration and for the Ingathering of the Exiles; it will foster the development of the country for the benefit of all its inhabitants; it will be based on freedom, justice and peace as envisaged by the prophets of Israel; it will ensure complete equality of social and political rights to all its inhabitants irrespective of religion, race or sex; it will guarantee freedom of religion, conscience, language, education and culture; it will safeguard the holy places of all religions; and it will be faithful to the principles of the Charter of the United Nations.

THE STATE OF ISRAEL is prepared to co-operate with the agencies and representatives of the United Nations in implementing the resolution of the General Assembly of the 29th November, 1947, and will take steps to bring about the economic union of the whole of Eretz Yisrael.

WE APPEAL to the United Nations to assist the Jewish people in the building-up of its State and to receive the State of Israel into the comity of nations.

WE APPEAL – in the very midst of the onslaught launched against us now for months – to the Arab inhabitants of the State of Israel to preserve peace and participate in the building of the State on the basis of full and equal citizenship and due representation in all its provisional and permanent institutions.

WE EXTEND our hand to all neighbouring states and their peoples in an offer of peace and good neighbourliness, and appeal to them to establish bonds of co-operation and mutual help with the sovereign Jewish people settled in its own land. The State of Israel is prepared to do its share in a common effort for the advancement of the entire Middle East.

WE APPEAL to the Jewish people throughout the Diaspora to rally round the Jews of Eretz Yisrael in the tasks of immigration and upbuilding and to stand by them in the great struggle for the realization of the age-old dream – the redemption of Israel.

Placing our trust in the Almighty, we affix our signatures to this proclamation at this session of the Provisional Council of State, on the soil of the homeland, in the city of Tel Aviv, on this Sabbath eve, the 5th day of Iyar, 5708 (14th May, 1948).

Hamilton to host Jewish Literary Festival

By JULIA KOLLEK
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — Twenty Jewish writers of poetry, plays, children and adult fiction, screenplays and short stories will converge on Temple Anshe Sholom here from May 24 to May 26 for the community's first Jewish Literary Festival.

The writers will offer a diverse weekend program, ranging from workshops in storytelling to a hands-on session on creative inspiration, as well as a multi-media presentation on poetry and psychiatry.

Ellen Jaffe, one of the festival's organizers, is a writer and teacher. She and friend Lil Blum came up with the idea for the gathering more than a year ago, after a synagogue service in which Blum read a story to the congregation.

"We were talking about how much people enjoy stories, and we started wondering if there had ever been a literary festival here," Jaffe said. "We decided to organize one, and began contacting the different writers we knew. Everyone we spoke to was enthusiastic and wanted to take part, and they began to recommend other writers. It just evolved from there."

With the current situation in the Middle East, Jaffe feels that celebrating the contributions of Jewish writing is timely.

"Jews have always thought of themselves as people of the book and writing is an important aspect of Judaism – it is how Jews have expressed themselves, and has always been the bridge between the past and present."

Jaffe acknowledges the Jewish influences in her own work. She is currently writing a novel for pre-teens about a family going through a death. The girl in the story uses her grandmother's menorah to travel through time, and what she sees in the past helps her deal with the present.

"The story has a universal appeal because of the time travel. But I find that as I get older, being Jewish affects my writing more. My grandparents were immigrants from Russia, and even though I grew up in New York where there is a large and accepted Jewish community, I always felt like an outsider.

"We all have different identities as people and being Jewish is part of that. Over the weekend, we'll be exploring to what extent it has affected our writing.

"For example, the Holocaust is an influence. Someone once said that after the Holocaust, there can't be poetry, but our guest poets and speakers want to show that this form of writing can help to deal with the tragedies and joys of living. The poet can carry the spirit of a people."

The festival's program features workshops for all ages, including a session on creativity in aging and a children's workshop and art session.

Jaffe stresses the event is open to all – you don't have to be Jewish or a writer to attend. While taking a Jewish perspective, the festival aims to encourage others to look at their own cultures.

She also hopes the festival will be inspirational – especially for the young.

If the festival proves successful, there are plans to hold it every two years.

The event is being sponsored by The Writers' Union of Canada and The League of Canadian Poets, as well as money from private sources.

Hadassah-WIZO presents awards

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — A recent gala reception on Parliament Hill was the venue for the presentation of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO's first Lifetime Achievement Awards.

Sheila Finestone and Dr. Joseph Keon, chosen for their many years of service to their communities and their country, were honoured as part of the organization's 85th anniversary celebration.

Finestone, a former Liberal senator and MP from Montreal, has been recognized in the past by Canadian Hadassah WIZO as one of its Women of Achievement.

Keon, founder of the University of Ottawa's Heart Institute, is respected and renowned internationally for his revolutionary work in the field of transplantation and for developing the institute into a first-class research and teaching centre.

In addition to Hadassah-WIZO members who attended from across Canada, many members of government and foreign diplomats attended the gala, including representatives from Israel, Austria, Argentina and Germany. Dinner guests were entertained by the Shira Ottawa Choir under the direction of Cantor Daniel Benlolo and accompanied by Aviva Lightstone.

Marion Mayman, national president of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO, began her remarks by noting the upsurge of anti-Semitism around the world and in Canada and by sending condolences to the families of those recently killed in Israel. She asked everyone to join her in a minute of silence.

"Now, more than ever, we must stand together in solidarity with the people of Israel," she said.

Avraham Lev-Lewis from the Israeli Embassy brought greetings on behalf of Ambassador Haim Divon, who was out of town.

"Hadassah is not just any Jewish organization in Canada," Lev-Lewis said. "All Jewish organizations are important, but Hadassah defines itself as a Zionist organization and this adds another dimension to its importance."

He thanked the organization for its support in raising money and awareness for Israel in the past and urged it to continue to do so in the future.

Various critics, some more equal than others

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Rex Murphy, a weekly columnist for the Globe and Mail and commentator for CBC's "The National," is a wonderful, graceful writer and a nuanced thinker.

In his Globe column "Some of Israel's critics are more equal than others" (April 27), he dismisses the question, "Is it possible to criticize Israel and not be anti-Semitic?" as childishly obvious (yes), and asks instead: "Can one scrutinize Israel with a moral microscope but put on a blindfold before turning to the Palestinians – and claim to be fair?"

For example, "Is news of an Israeli atrocity seized on with great eagerness while say, a Passover butchery of civilians is, if at all, brought in the discussion only reluctantly and with much moral throat-clearing? Do you wait up at night for the bad news about [Israeli Prime Minister] Ariel Sharon but put out a 'do not disturb' sign for any bulletins of [Palestinian Authority Chairman] Yasser Arafat's duplicity?"

These questions deserve careful consideration by all journalists, including even some Jewish writers who during these painful days join in the denunciations of Israel, and of Sharon in particular, in the most strident terms.

Naomi Klein, for instance, went so far as to charge that Sharon's actions contributed to anti-Semitism (Globe and Mail, April 24), thereby revealing that she completely misconstrues anti-Semitism's very nature: an irrational hatred of Jews, for which the anti-Semite will always find an excuse. While criticism of Sharon is certainly valid, one hopes that at least some context about the violence Israelis confront would be provided. But to be oblivious to the nature of anti-Semitism and to argue that Sharon is complicit in promoting it is abysmal.

Yoel Marcus, a writer never shy about criticizing Israeli politicians, captures the proper context:

"We have good reason to criticize Sharon, Netanyahu, the Labor Party and the blunders and the lack of initiative of the government. But when all is said and done, we must remember that the person who brought us hither, the father of all sin, is Yasser Arafat. He screwed peace. He thumbed his nose at the Oslo accords and set the whole region ablaze. He wanted 'blood and fire' and brought to power those who would give it to him. He screwed us, but more so, he screwed his own people. Revolution, they say, consumes its own. Too bad the Palestinian revolution didn't consume him. Maybe then they would have a state today" (Ha'aretz, April 26).

Marcus' view is the consensus in Israel today, especially among those who believed the Oslo process would lead to a two-state solution that would provide peace and security for Israelis and dignity for both Israelis and Palestinians. Sharon's election stemmed foremost from a desire to restore security to a badly shaken populace. The gross violation of the promise of social justice was caused by Arafat's violent behaviour, which well preceded Sharon's election. Let us not lose sight of cause and effect.

Paul Michaels is director of communications for the Canada-Israel Committee.

Former SS man arrested

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A former SS officer convicted in absentia by an Italian court for war crimes was arrested last week in Vancouver and held in custody pending an extradition hearing on murder charges involving 11 victims.

RCMP officers arrested Michael Seifert, 78, as he left church following mass as the Holy Family Parish church. He is wanted by the government of Italy for allegedly murdering prisoners at the Bolzano prison camp between December 1944 and April 1945.

Patrick Charette, a spokesperson for the Justice Department, told The CJN that Seifert was arrested at the request of the Italian government.

Seifert's Italian conviction in November 2000 was followed by the launch of denaturalization proceedings in Canada as federal authorities moved to strip Seifert of his Canadian citizenship. That case remains on a parallel track to the extradition matter, said Terry Beitner, director and general counsel of the Justice Department's war crimes unit.

Documents submitted in the Federal Court of Canada in connection with the denaturalization case claim Seifert was vicious and cruel in the treatment of prisoners at the Bolzano (Bozen) camp.

"Seifert was personally involved in the beatings, the torture and the killing of prisoners in the camp and in the [camp's] isolation cells," the government's statement of claim alleges.

In Vancouver, Seifert's lawyer Doug Christie applied for bail, saying his client was frail and not a flight risk. He argued Seifert's indefinite incarceration pending the extradition hearing would bring the administration of justice into "gross disrepute," the Vancouver Sun reported.

Justice department lawyer Roger McMeans opposed Seifert's release, arguing he had been convicted of serious crimes and that freeing him would "undermine confidence in the Canadian judicial system."

McMeans later told reporters that although the charges relate to events at the Bolzano camp during World War II, Italy's extradition request was based on murder charges, not war crimes.

Seifert's bail hearing was adjourned until last Friday to allow Christie to digest the voluminous legal documentation presented him by Crown lawyers.

Canadian Jewish Congress applauded Seifert's arrest. "Canada must not be, or be perceived as, a safe haven for those who have committed war crimes and crimes against humanity, from the Second World War or more contemporary conflicts," said Irving Abella, chair of Congress' war crimes committee.

Meanwhile, in his statement of defence to the denaturalization charge, Christie alleged "Jewish animosity" motivated former citizenship and immigration minister Elinor Caplan to initiate citizenship proceedings against his client.

"The actions of the minister against an ethnic German are an indication of reasonable apprehension of bias, are scandalous and vexatious, arising out of a conflict of interest originating in the Jewish animosity by [Caplan] to the defendant's ethnic background," the statement of defence alleges.

In addition to representing Seifert, Christie has acted for Nazi apologist Ernst Zundel, Holocaust denier Jim Keegstra, and alleged war criminal Imre Finta, who was acquitted of all charges against him.

Holocaust educational symposium draws over 1,000

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada's first daylong Holocaust Education Symposium attracted more than 1,000 Manitoba high school students and teachers from 30 schools and the lineup of speakers gave them much to think about.

The symposium, a year in the planning, was held May 1 at the University of Winnipeg. The day began with a musical excerpt from The Wave, a play that shows how easy it is in a school setting to turn teens against a perceived minority.

The first speaker was Leon Bass, a retired Philadelphia educator and one of the first U.S. soldiers to walk through the gates of Buchenwald in 1945.

Bass, who has spoken in Winnipeg before, described with passion what it felt like to be a black man in America in the 1940s, a time when black men "were not good enough" to eat in restaurants in the South, drink from water fountains or sit in the front section of buses. But they were "good enough" to put their lives on the line for their country, he said.

Bass enlisted straight out of high school in 1943 and ended up in Europe serving with an all-black battalion. At the time, he recalled, he was segregated from his white friends because the U.S. army was still segregated.

His stop in Buchenwald changed his life.

"It was 1945 and we were winning the war," Bass said. "We were ordered to go into east Germany. A lieutenant asked me and two other guys to come with him to a concentration camp. I didn't know anything about concentration camps. We never learned about them in training. Walking through the gates of Buchenwald was the shock of my life. I was totally unprepared for what I saw and I will never forget it."

He described for the students in graphic detail the walking skeletons, the crematoria and the other horrors he saw.

"I couldn't believe that this could happen in a civilized society like Germany," he said. "It helped me see clearly that human suffering wasn't just about me. It can touch all of us. The Nazis were saying all those people were not good enough to live.

"That day, I saw the face of evil – racism, anti-Semitism, hatred – carried to the ultimate. I knew I had to do something about it."

After returning home, Bass decided to become a teacher. To his anger and disappointment, even at Westchester College in Pennsylvania, he faced discrimination: he wasn't allowed to live in the university dorm.

After graduation, Bass became an elementary school teacher and later an elementary school principal. He took inspiration from Martin Luther King Jr. and participated in the March on Washington in 1963. In 1970, he became the first black principal of an all-black, all male school in Philadelphia that was dominated by street gangs.

"For the first month of classes, I wandered around with a constant dull headache trying to get a handle on things," he said. "Then, one day, I went into a classroom and found the students being rude to a visitor. She was a survivor of Auschwitz trying to tell her story. I began telling them my story. Those young men listened quietly to me and her and left the class wordlessly.

"She encouraged me to share my experiences and I have been doing it ever since.

"Evil is potentially within us all waiting to take over our minds and bodies," Bass told his student audience. "You have to stand up against evil even if it may put you up against your best friends."

He identified the keys to fighting evil as education and love.

The next presentation was a panel consisting of Holocaust survivor Barbara Goszer and her daughter, Sharon Goszer Tritt, and Albert Gazan and his Canadian-born wife, Marjorie.

Gazan was an infant in Holland when war broke out and spent the war years being hidden in different homes. His parents also survived the war, but most of the rest of his family perished.

"I didn't feel like a survivor," he said. "Rather, I was the child of survivors."

Barbara Goszer came to Winnipeg as a war orphan in 1949. The only survivor in her family, she was nine when war broke out and was hidden by a Christian family for most of the conflict.

"I never spoke about the Holocaust to my children," she said. "I didn't want to burden them. I wanted them to have a normal life. It wasn't until they were at university that I realized how much anger I had built up inside me. Now that I speak out about the Holocaust publicly over the last few years, I feel easier."

Goszer Tritt said she has learned about her mother's wartime experiences mainly from her public lectures. "My parents [Barbara's husband, Elliott, is also a survivor] never talked about the war while we were growing up and we never had the courage to ask," Goszer Tritt said. "We probably learned that silence was the best defence mechanism."

Although her parents spoke with an accent and she didn't have any grandparents, Goszer Tritt said her life seemed no different than her friends with Canadian-born parents.

She said that although they had few blood relatives, the family had a very close relationship with other survivor families.

It was the birth of her own child that caused Goszer Tritt to want to learn more about her family history.

The final speaker of the day was Ken McVay, director of the Nizkor Project, an Internet-based archive that debunks and challenges Holocaust deniers.

The conference was funded by the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba, the Winnipeg Foundation and Heritage Canada's Multiculturalism program. Barbara Kowall, one of the organizers, said the symposium will become an annual event if funding can be procured.

Brain Tumor Foundation invites walkers to participate in 2002 Toronto Spring Sprint

TORONTO — The Brain Tumor Foundation of Canada (BTFC) is calling on all walkers to lace up their shoes and join Toronto's annual Spring Sprint on Sunday, May 12 in Sunnybrook Park.

The Spring Sprint, one of 10 held annually in cities across Canada, raises money for brain tumour support services, research and education. All money raised will help those affected by brain tumours.

More than 10,000 Canadians are diagnosed with a brain tumour each year. These individuals suffer from seizures, paralysis, speech impairment, vision, hearing, and memory loss. Brain tumours affect people of all ages and there is no cure. BTFC is devoted to improving the quality of life for those affected.

"BTFC currently has over 20 communities asking for a support group to be established," said Kathy Leclair, BTFC support services co-ordinator. "These support groups provide an opportunity for people with brain tumours and their loved ones to share experiences, address personal issues and gain emotional support. Funds raised by Spring Sprints will help bring these support groups to fruition, so no one suffers from the disease alone."

Cotler addresses conference for women leaders

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — As the only male member of the Parliamentary Women's Caucus, Montreal Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler felt right at home addressing the first Canadian Jewish Women's Leadership Development Conference in ten years.

Cotler was one of a host of speakers, including high-profile Torontonians Julia Koschitzky and Rachael Turkienicz, that addressed the conference, held April 26 to April 29 in Winnipeg.

The conference drew about 90 women, split almost equally between local attendees and delegates from across Canada, and focussed on Israel advocacy and Jewish education.

"UIA Women's Division leaders have been meeting a couple of times a year over the past three or four years as part of the UIA/Federation Canada general meetings," said conference co-ordinator Elaine Goldstine. "Usually Women's Division presidents would stay behind an extra day for meetings. We felt it was time for something more comprehensive. The turnout has shown there is a need for this."

The Saturday programming focused primarily on education, beginning with a women's service in the morning led by Rachael Turkienicz and followed by presentations on the changing Jewish world, the influence of women on biblical history, a discussion about how one's views inform one's decisions and a talk by Toronto social worker Joe Rich on the changing family. The day also included a lunch with Argentine Jewish emigres to Canada and a walking tour of Winnipeg.

Cotler was the lead-off speaker on Sunday morning. He spoke about the various factors that influence Canadian public opinion and foreign policy and how the two have evolved since Israel's creation in 1948.

The basic principles remain relatively unchanged, he said. Canada recognizes Israel's legitimacy and right to security, supports the search for a comprehensive peace in the Middle East and opposes Israeli control of the West Bank and Gaza and the presence of the settlements. Canada also supports the creation of a Palestinian state.

More recent developments have been the government's condemnation of terrorism and support for the dismantling of Hamas, Islamic Jihad and the military wing of Hezbollah.

"Canada recognizes Israel's right to defend itself against terror while at the same time, our country continues to call for negotiations and respect for human rights and the rule of law," Cotler said.

Cotler said Prime Minister Jean Chrétien's attendance at a major Canada-Israel Committee meeting in March was a watershed event. He said Chrétien spoke about the special kinship between Canada and Israel and showed that he cared about Israelis who live in fear of terror on a daily basis.

Cotler also noted that the media are image-driven, moralistic and take events in the Middle East, which he said receives an inordinate amount of coverage, out of historical context.

He added that non-governmental agencies, anti-globalization forces, Canadian church groups, academics and intellectuals, the campus culture, the left, human rights groups, international professional associations, the United Nations, and the European Union are all anti-Israel. As well, he noted that U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell and the U.S. State Department take a position similar to the Europeans.

Cotler also argued that American foreign policy may unintentionally promote an anti-Israel response in Canada, since there are some Canadian nationalists who oppose any American position on principle.

But Cotler said Israel itself deserves some criticism for not speaking out against Canada for voting in favour of anti-Israel resolutions at the United Nations.

"[United Nations Secretary-General] Kofi Annan recently said that, regarding Israel, the whole world can't be wrong," Cotler said. "We have learned time and again in our history that the whole world can be wrong."

Still, he said, he believes in the end that truth and justice will prevail.

Cotler was followed by a panel consisting of Joe Wilder, chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, Maxine Finkelstein, deputy vice-president of UIA Montreal and Winnipeg MP Judy Wasylycia-Leis that talked about advocating for Israel.

Wilder said that, despite the many biases against Israel among Canadian and world public opinion makers, Canada's foreign policy has become more supportive of Israel in recent months, as evidenced by Canadian votes against anti-Israel resolutions at recent UN meetings.

Judy Wasylycia-Leis of the NDP expressed her appreciation at even being invited to address a Jewish group after her colleague Svend Robinson's attempt to visit Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat while he was under siege in Ramallah.

Cotler praised Wasylycia-Leis for speaking out in caucus against Robinson and influencing the NDP position on the Mideast conflict.

Julia Koschitzky closed the conference on Monday afternoon with a look ahead.

Goldstine reports that there will be a review of, and follow-up, to the conference at UIA meetings in June. "We will probably hold this conference every other year," she said.

Cystic fibrosis walk-a-thon at zoo May 26

TORONTO — May is Cystic Fibrosis Month, but few Canadians know what cystic fibrosis is or whom it affects.

It is estimated that one in every 25 Canadians carries the gene responsible for cystic fibrosis (CF) and that one in every 2,500 children born in Canada has the disease. It is fatal and today affects more than 3,000 children and young adults across the country.

Living with CF is a way of life for those suffering with the disease. It infects the lungs and the digestive system, with symptoms including salty-tasting skin, persistent coughing, wheezing or pneumonia, and poor weight gain, despite a normal or large appetite.

The 17th annual Zellers Friends of the Family Walk for Cystic Fibrosis takes place Sunday, May 26 at the Toronto Zoo. If you have $25 in pledges, you get free admission to the zoo, lunch, games and prizes. To sign up for the walk, go to your local Zellers store or call the Canadian Cystic Fibrosis Foundation (CCFF) at 416-485-9149.

Daily, children and young adults with CF must consume a large number of artificial enzymes to help them absorb sufficient nutrition and undergo a demanding daily routine of physical therapy designed to keep the lungs free of congestion and infection. Despite this aggressive treatment and other prescribed measures that must be taken, lung infection and its complications eventually claim the life of virtually every person with CF.

Thanks to great advances in Canadian research, remarkable progress is being made to help find a cure. In 1960, children born with CF did not live past four years. Today, the median age of survival is over 30 years. Much of this progress can be attributed to the establishment of the CCFF and key corporate partners who help fund research in Canada.

Canadian researchers are viewed as leaders in the global effort to find a cure or control for CF. Their groundbreaking work yielded significant advances in recent years, particularly since discovery in 1989 of the gene responsible for the disease. The discovery furthered understanding of CF and has brought a cure closer.

Relationships move peace forward

"The breakdown in key relationships between the leaders in the Middle East is one of the biggest obstacles and challenges to overcome."

Firas noted that in the past, it was the personal friendships that developed between the late King Hussein, the late Yitzhak Rabin and Chairman Yasser Arafat that allowed the peace process to move forward.

At this stage, when you don't see those kinds of qualitative relationships in place, it is important to continue dialogue in other arenas, he said.

Pointing to CISEPO as an example of an organization that has brought Israelis, Jordanians and Palestinians together through a Canadian umbrella based at Mount Sinai Hospital and the University of Toronto, Firas noted the importance of implementing projects on the ground.

Recently nominated for the Conrad N. Hilton Humanitarian Prize for its peace-building role in the Middle East, CISEPO develops academic and cultural interchanges in education and research.

Concrete results in the field of health care have allowed for an ethic of peace to develop through human relationships, said the prince, who is the Jordanian patron of the Middle East Association for Managing Hearing Loss (MEHA), as well as private secretary to His Majesty King Abdullah for health affairs.

In Jordan, one of the many policy issues Firas has explored has been the implementation of a cost effective approach to universal health care.

"The Canadian government has done a fabulous job covering everyone," he said, adding that achieving basic access is currently one of Jordan's biggest challenges.

As the patron of MEHA, which was formed in 1998 under the auspices of CISEPO, the Prince has guided a team of scientists and health workers in the screening and rehabilitation of thousands of Jordanian, Palestinian and Israeli infants.

With the support of a Canadian team led by Dr. Arnold Noyek, MEHA has provided opportunities for health professionals and lay people from Israeli and Arab communities to meet and discuss issues that affect them all.

MEHA has done a lot in terms of building confidence and trust between Palestinian, Israeli and Jordanian practitioners, Firas said.

These kinds of health-care activities on the ground can win the hearts and minds of many people, the prince said. "But they can go only go so far without a political framework.

"The current environment has allowed the views of extremists on both sides to dominate the agenda and drown out the voices of the more moderate elements."

Describing himself as a "militant moderate," Firas stressed the importance of being "more militant about moderate beliefs and getting those views out there."

Both sides need to move forward, he said. For the Arab states, it's a matter of preparing their people, through education, for the prospect of peace. And the Israelis will have to accept the notion of Palestinian statehood and reconcile themselves to exchanging land for peace.

"I think everyone believes that sooner or later we will have a settlement to this conflict and that preparing the public and their children... for this eventuality should come sooner rather than later.

"Jordan has always clung to the middle ground and pushed that agenda," Firas said.

By focusing on hope and the more optimistic endeavours that have occurred, the prince said the people of Jordan have followed the Confucian saying that "it's better to light a candle than curse the darkness."

Bernard Betel Centre to the rescue

For Evelyn, it gave new direction, new friends and new love ...

At 81, Evelyn Rabkin-Yuditsky, has had a fresh start on life at the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living.

Evelyn had an active lifestyle, many friends and a loving marriage in Montreal. After the couple's three sons moved here, they decided to relocate to Toronto, but the move was difficult.

Both became depressed. They knew no one but their adult children. Most days, they would go from mall to mall or sit on a park bench waiting for their kids to come home from work. And after a hard day's work, their children weren't always able to entertain Mom and Dad.

Then the couple heard about the Bernard Betel Centre. They became involved in the Book Club, Health Education, Social Events, and began to volunteer. Their children started to complain that Evelyn and her husband were too busy to call them.

Sadly, Evelyn's husband died suddenly, leaving her utterly devastated. She turned to the Betel Centre. Besides counselling and friendship, Evelyn received support and encouragement in finding a new direction.

She had started to adjust to the recent trauma when sudden illness resulted in hip surgery. The centre's V.I.S.I.T program sent a friendly visitor twice a week; another volunteer called her every day. New friends brought food and comfort. Once recovered, she started to take Gentle Fitness and gradually attended other programs at the centre.

In 1998, she met and married Ed Yuditsky, a member of the centre. Now, once again she is happily married and very involved with life.

Last year, Evelyn started "Fun With Yiddish." The group shares stories, jokes and anecdotes. She is an active volunteer on many committees.

Evelyn Rabkin-Yuditsky is a shining example of how the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living can change lives.

MPs, Senators in Israel

In all, 11 Liberal MPs, four from the Canadian Alliance, five members of the Bloc Québécois, two New Democrats and five senators went on the mission, designed to underline the fluid situation facing Israel.

"We felt the situation has changed so much that it was necessary to get updates," said Fogel, who accompanied the trip along with CIC vice-chair Norm Godfrey. Canada's Jewish community "badly needed this, to see a large group of parliamentarians to simply go and say 'We care about Israel.'"

The MPs and senators were kept hopping. In just two days, they met with:

• Canada's ambassador to Israel, Michael Bell and Steve Hibbert, the Canadian representative to the Palestinian Authority. Issues centred on concerns that Canadian humanitarian aid is being used to foment anti-Israel and anti-Semitic sentiment in the Palestinian school system. Fogel said while participants were satisfied that no Canadian tax dollars fund anti-Israel textbooks, there remained a concern that Ottawa's aid isn't always used "to advance Canadian values in the Palestinian educational system, and that perhaps [Canada's] financial commitment should re-orient its approach."

• deputy foreign minister Rabbi Michael Melchior, who thanked Canada for running interference for Israel at the recently-concluded annual meeting of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights. Canada opposed two anti-Israel resolutions at the meeting. Melchior specifically thanked foreign minister Bill Graham and defence minister Art Eggleton for their support.

• Danny Shek, a leading political analyst, who provided the MPs and senators with a "strategic briefing," followed by a military briefing by an army brigadier-general.

• Lt.-Col. Miri Eisen, a spokesperson for the IDF's intelligence branch, who became a familiar face on television when she revealed Palestinian invoices and bills for explosives purportedly signed off by Yasser Arafat. Eisen briefed the Canadians on terrorism's infrastructure.

• President Katsav and Avraham Burg, the speaker of the Knesset.

• academics at Hebrew University and at the Palestinian Institute for International Studies.

• Dore Gold, a senior policy advisor to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and rumoured to be Israel's next ambassador to the United States.

• Knesset members across the political spectrum, with whom the Canadians developed an "automatic bond," Fogel said. "They had a lot of shared issues – elections, parliamentary things. I think it gave the Canadians an appreciation of the dynamism of Israel's democracy." Later, the Canadians were recognized during a Knesset session.

• Shimon Peres, probably the trip's highlight, said Fogel. The foreign minister had scheduled 30 minutes with the group, but ended up spending 90 minutes. "I've never seen him so disturbed," Fogel remarked. "There was a sense of betrayal of how evident it's become that there doesn't seem to be any intention of genuine peace among Palestinians." In any event, the Canadians, he said, came away with an appreciation "that the government is not a Sharon government, but a broad coalition."

• and Canadian expatriates, who gave their take on living in Israel.

Palestinian-driven allegations of an Israeli massacre in the Jenin refugee camp were brought up, but, said Fogel, "I don't think anyone left believing that any massacre took place."

Pat Martin, an NDP MP from Winnipeg, said the trip "reconfirmed" his feelings about Israel.

"I have to admit a pro-Israel bias," Martin told The CJN. "I now feel more comfortable with my position that Israel has every right to take actions to protect itself."

The mission left him with "the impression that the international community has been much too harsh and holds Israel to a higher standard."

While some of the BQ members may not be strongly supportive of Israel, the MPs and senators "all came away very sympathetic to the position Israel finds itself in." And all the parliamentarians, he said, now share the view that Arafat is not the man to make peace.

"He's demonstrated a wilful hijacking of the peace process," Martin said. "That view was broadly accepted."

And he now appreciates more than ever that Israel has shown "admirable restraint" in its military actions against Palestinians.

"It was a real history lesson," said Martin. "I was so enthused and excited, that I intend to go back."

In a related development, Prime Minister Jean Chrétien spoke out at a Liberal fundraising dinner last week against the recent rise of acts of hatred around the world aimed at Jews and Muslims, saying that Canadians cannot ignore such intolerance.

"We have to take these acts very seriously, because the lessons of history teach us that we ignore acts of intolerance at our peril," Chrétien was reported to have said to strong applause.

"Canada is based on the ideals of unity in diversity, of a society where people can live and work together regardless of their language, their religion, or the colour of their skin. These are the values and principles that Canadians are proud to project on the international stage."

Jews expelled from Arab lands forgotten: prof

By ELIAS LEVY
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Forgotten Exodus: The expulsion of the Jews from Arab lands and the Israeli-Arab dispute. That was the theme of a conference held recently in Paris, under the aegis of the Jewish European Congress.

Some 1,500 people attended the conference, including Israeli, French, American and Canadian university professors, historians, lawyers and writers, among them Quebec writer Naïm Kattan and Liberal MP Irwin Cotler.

At a time when the Palestinians are demanding the "right of return" to present-day Israel, the conference aimed to bring to light a tragic and little-known episode in Sephardi Jewish history that had been repressed for ideological reasons by everyone involved.

Shmuel Trigano, a sociology professor at the University of Paris-X-Nanterre and conference's main organizer, said the symposium was also a way to offer dignity to a group that had its way of life interrupted and its continuity shattered.

Trigano, the founder and director of the Jewish studies college of the Alliance Israélite Universelle and of Pardès, the European journal of Jewish studies and culture, as well as the author of some 30 books, was interviewed by The CJN shortly after the conference.

Canadian Jewish News: What was the main purpose of the conference?

Shmuel Trigano: The main purpose was to restore the moral dignity of the State of Israel and its historic truth. For several decades, the State of Israel has been charged with congenital guilt, because, according to its detractors, it chased out a nation in order to settle in its land. People are going out of their way to depict Israel and the cause of the Jewish people as a state founded on the dispossession of the Palestinian people, as a flagrant injustice.

They have, however, forgotten that 60 per cent of Israeli Jews were also chased out of their native lands and were forced to leave. The Palestinians' invocation of the right of return, since before the latest intifadah, has reawakened our memory. A memory that has been hidden and repressed has returned to the Jews of the Arab world, to the descendants of the 900,000 people who, from the 1940s on, had to leave the countries they had been living in for a very long time – because of the violence organized by the Arab governments, or because they had no choice – while leaving behind all their possessions. Like the Palestinians, these Sephardi Jews still held the keys to their houses as they left in haste.

> About 10,000 Jews in Arab-Muslim world

CJN: Is the forced expulsion of the Jews from Arab countries comparable to that of the Palestinians, then?

Shmuel Trigano: Yes. There was an exchange of populations, as 600,000 Jews displaced from Arab countries immigrated to Israel, on the one hand, and on the other, 540,000 Palestinians displaced after the creation of Israel found themselves in several Arab countries. Those 600,000 Jews were stripped of all their belongings. They too lived in "transit camps." We have a battle to fight on an international level, because this chapter of the history of the Jews from Arab lands has been completely hidden.

The fact that this indisputable historic reality is unknown allows the Palestinians to present themselves today as absolute victims.

CJN: Is there a pattern to the departure of the Jews from the Arab countries?

Shmuel Trigano: Yes. In some countries, the Jews found themselves excluded through legal actions that led to the loss of their rights as citizens, and the exclusions forced them into exile. In Iraq, there were even military expulsion programs, transferring people by truck through Jordan. In Yemen, the Jewish community was given a short period to leave before all emigration was forbidden. They were stripped of all their possessions by a subterfuge developed by the local authorities. In Egypt, the Jews were gradually excluded from any economic life, then they were interned, and their property was confiscated, to the point where life had become a hell. The Egyptians Jews also left with only a suitcase, leaving behind all their personal belongings... In other cases, the Jews left because they were afraid and felt they had no longer any future where they were.

CJN: The Palestinian refugees are insistent today in claiming financial compensation from Israel. Shouldn't the Jews who were forced to leave the Arab countries also have the right to financial compensation?

Shmuel Trigano: Absolutely. Financial compensation must also be paid to the Jews who had to leave with only a suitcase and left behind all their possessions. There is no reason to compensate the Palestinians and not the Jews under the pretext that the Jews may be pariahs, wanderers, and that it was therefore quite normal to expel them, to have them leave behind all their possessions.

CJN: How many Jews are still in the Muslim Arab countries?

Shmuel Trigano: About 10,000 Jews still live in the Arab-Muslim world, mainly in Morocco, and, to a lesser degree, in Tunisia. There are also a few thousand in Iran. The Iranian Jews cannot emigrate. Otherwise, the entire Arab world has been emptied of its Jews. We have to remember that what happened to 60 per cent of Israel's Jews is directly related to the history of the Arab nation states. When the Arab nation states were created in the Islamic Arab world, there was no longer any place for the Jews in those states.

New residents feel right at home at L'chaim

L'chaim retirement homes inc.

There's no place like home, and that's why L'chaim Retirement Home has surpassed the expectations of its residents, management, and staff. It isn't an "alternative to home". It isn't a "replacement home". It isn't just a "nice place to visit." It's HOME.

This relaxed yet caring atmosphere didn't just materialize out of thin air. Years of careful planning went into creating the kind of environment and ambience that would allow residents to "be themselves" in the most uplifting surroundings possible. It starts with a front lobby and dining room that are filled with natural light. Bathed in sunshine on bright days, pleasant even on cloudy days, the dining area is the happy hub around which L'chaim revolves. Here, residents enjoy three delicious haymishe meals daily as well as afternoon tea, at which they're treated to cakes baked fresh daily by none other than founder Judy Cohen — a "hands-on" approach if ever there was one.

Judy's passion for enhancing the seniors experience knows no bounds. "This isn't just a job to me," she enthuses. "Nothing gives me more pleasure than making each and every resident feel wanted, comfortable, and happy. I never forgot how well my father was treated in his later years, and I always wanted to offer the same level of care to others. Now, I can."

One of the things residents and visitors alike love about L'chaim is its youthful spirit. One brief visit will convince you that in this respect, it's wonderfully different from all other retirement homes.

But don't let the intimate atmosphere fool you. L'chaim is state-of-the-art from top to bottom. No expense has been spared to ensure the comfort and safety of the residents. Each single room has a private bathroom, shower, air conditioning, and heating controls. Wheelchair-accessible rooms are also available. A major weekly cleaning and linen change are offered, and there's a laundry room on every floor for residents who wish to do their own washing and drying. And all this is available at extremely reasonable prices.

Equally impressive is the variety of activities, programs and services offered to residents. Under the supervision of Director Wendy Isenberg, with many years of devoted service in the retirement field, residents enjoy a wide range of outings and activities, such as bingo, trivia, and live music, to name but a few.

On-site access to health care professionals such as a general practitioner, physiotherapist and podiatrist ensures that residents' medical needs are addressed. A hairstylist visits once a week for those who wish to look as young as they feel.

If the more independent older members of your family wish to enjoy a true "golden age" in an active lifestyle environment, they'll find a home at L'chaim. All their needs will be attended to while they live life to the fullest, enjoying new experiences and forging new friendships.

Sometimes all it takes is a kind word or a caring gesture to turn a frown into a smile. That kind of enthusiasm and caring is ever-present at L'chaim, where every day is an occasion to celebrate.

Shavuot

Blintzes reign supreme at Shavuot

BY RIVKA TAL
Special to The CJN

The words blintzes and Shavuot seem to go together like apples with honey for Rosh Hashanah and hamantaschen for Purim. There is an ancient tradition of eating dairy foods on Shavuot, and blintzes have reigned for centuries as the automatic byword of the Ashkenazim.

But we are also urged to enhance our Shabbat and festivals with meat and wine. So we find ourselves in a quandary every year. Since the mitzvah is to eat (at least) two festive meals on Shavuot, many people eat one dairy meal and one meat meal. Some eat dairy at night and meat during the day; some reverse the schedule. Some have cheesecake at an early-morning kiddush after having studied Torah all night, take a nap and then wake up to a meat/chicken meal. There are all sorts of possible combinations.

The Tal family debates this question every year. My husband likes nothing better than finding meat and wine on the menu on yom tov, and could easily skip the dairy part. The children's preferences vary from year to year. And me? Well, I do like giving the nice milchik serving pieces at least a once-a-year showing, although I agree with my friends that a milchik meal usually entails a lot more putchkerei. Somehow we think we have to serve more choices.

But this year, since the holiday and Shabbat are back to back, the decision seems simpler. Our traditional meat meals on Shabbat are not up for negotiation. So it seems the best advice is to have a meat meal on Thursday night, a dairy meal for lunch on Friday, and then regular Shabbat meals on Shabbat. Since we had the same situation three years ago, I dug in my files and found menus that could work this year, too.

Confession time? I buy those ready-to-cook frozen loaves of gefilte fish; I have given up on making my own. I will share my homemade Crown Half-and Half-Challah recipe with you another time. If you have any questions, please e-mail me at rtal@012.net.il and I will try to help. Chag Samayach to everyone!

WARM PURPLE CABBAGE

A delicious recipe from my Viennese-born mother-in-law. The purple cabbage looks beautiful on the table along with yellow rice with raisins and almonds and the pot roast.

1 medium red cabbage
1 tbsp. oil
1 medium onion
1-2 tbsp. brown sugar
5 whole cloves
2 cups water
juice of 1 lemon
3 tbsp. sugar
salt and pepper to taste

Optional thickener:
3 tbsp. sifted flour and 3 tbsp. cold water:

Slice or shred the cabbage and slice the onion. Heat the oil in a large saucepan, saute the onion and brown sugar, stirring constantly, for approximately 5 minutes, until golden brown. Mix in the cabbage and the cloves, reduce heat and let simmer for 15 minutes.

Add 2 cups of water, lemon juice, granulated sugar and salt and pepper to taste. Bring to a boil and then reduce heat. Simmer for approximately 40 minutes.

Remove cloves. Correct the seasoning and serve hot.

Optional thickener: mix 3 tbsp. sifted flour with 3 tbsp. cold water and stir quickly into the cabbage mixture. Cook an additional 10 minutes.

VEGETABLE POT PIE

1½ tbsp. vegetable oil
1 large onion, chopped
3 large garlic cloves, minced
½ lb. mushrooms, coarsely chopped
3 cups of the following vegetables, or a combination: thinly sliced zucchini, thin carrot curls, frozen chopped spinach (defrosted and squeezed dry), frozen corn kernels (defrosted)
1½ cup sour cream or unflavoured yogurt
4 oz. cubed feta cheese
½ cup grated Parmesan cheese (optional)
1 frozen puff pastry sheet (half of 17¼-oz. package), thawed
1 egg, beaten to blend with 1 tbsp. water

Heat oil in a large skillet. Saute onions and garlic until golden, about 4-5 minutes. Add remaining vegetables and continue to saute for 5-7 minutes, until tender. Remove from heat and cool slightly. Stir in sour cream, feta cheese and Parmesan cheese (optional).

Preheat oven to 425. Roll out pastry sheet on lightly floured surface to 12-inch square. Place vegetable mixture filling in 10-inch diameter quiche or pie dish. Arrange pastry over filling in dish. Fold up edges to fit the dish. Press firmly around rim of dish to seal. Cut several slits in top to vent steam. Brush with egg-water mixture. Bake until crust puffs up and surface is golden brown (about 25 minutes). Serve wedge-shaped portions. Serves 6.

A diverse history of Jewish cuisine

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

Once in a great while a cookbook comes along so utterly gorgeous it practically springs from my kitchen shelf and hurls itself upon my coffee table.

Marlena Spieler's latest, The Jewish Heritage Cookbook (Lorenz Books), subtitled "a fascinating journey through the rich and diverse history of the Jewish cuisine," is so leap-off-the-page lusciously photographed you can practically taste the food. But lest you think this book is just another pretty face, Spieler, the author of more than 40 cookbooks, includes informative chapters on the history of Jewish cuisine, the holidays and kashrut, as well as general guides to the preparation of all foods Jewish, everything from grilling mamaliga to pounding hawaij and berbere (spice mixtures).

"This is my first Jewish cookbook," said the California native on a recent visit to San Francisco from her home in London. "I've done theme books, like Mediterranean and olive oil and mushrooms, but I've always had a Jewish touch somewhere, including dishes form either Israel or my travels or my Jewish family and friends."

Spieler fondly remembers Sundays in her grandmother's kitchen, her early inspiration. "My grandmother ran a law firm and worked until a few days before she died at 93. Well, she had to cut back a little – she only worked from nine to five then! But on Sunday morning, people would start coming and she would start cooking. I couldn't say they'd come for breakfast, lunch or dinner, because it was all one meal.

"We would smell the chicken soup as we went off to synagogue school, and by the time we got home she'd have matzah brei and kasha varenishkes and meat patties with onions. This went on until late evening. Bachi really gave me the love of cooking."

Spieler travelled widely as a young adult, even living in Israel for a year, and she was working as an artist in Greece when she started including recipes with her drawings of food. A publisher offered to publish the recipes (minus the drawings!) launching her career as a food writer, broadcaster and columnist.

These days, Spieler divides her time between San Francisco and London, where she is a frequent guest on the BBC. Her column The Roving Feast is carried by the New York Times syndicate and the San Francisco Chronicle.

The Jewish Heritage Cookbook is a truly international culmination of Spieler's curiosity about our people and our food. "I love meeting Jews from different cultures, because they have different dishes on the table," she said. "I love to cook and hear their stories and find it really exciting that people with such different cultures share the same heritage and holidays."

The book's section on the festival of Shavuot (literally "weeks," because it occurs seven weeks after Pesach) is accompanied by a magnificent illustration from a 13th-century manuscript of the Book of Ruth, the portion read on this holiday.

Shavuot, which begins at sundown on May 16, commemorates the giving of the Torah as well as the offering of the first fruits of the season. Spieler notes that although Shavuot meals are traditionally dairy, "there are no rules that say this must be done."

Why dairy? Scholars differ, she says. Perhaps the tradition evolved because spring grazing produces more milk at this time. Also, in Song of Songs, the Torah is associated with milk and honey. Some suggest that while the Israelites were receiving the Ten Commandments, they were gone so long that their milk turned to cheese; others contend that upon their return they were too hungry for anything but milk to sustain them.

Whatever the explanation, for Ashkenazim it's bring on the blintzes, while Sephardim enjoy cheese-filled borekas.

A typical Shavuot starter in central Europe is Hungarian Cherry Soup perfumed with cinnamon and almond flavour. "The nice thing about this soup," noted Spieler, "is at Shavuot the days are beginning to get warm, and it is really refreshing. I eat it as often as a dessert as with a meal."

Summer Squash and Baby New Potatoes in Warm Dill Sour Cream is a festive Israeli celebration of spring and perfect for Shavuot with its fragrant dill and sour cream or yogurt topping.

HUNGARIAN CHERRY SOUP

2¼ lb. fresh, frozen or canned sour cherries, pitted
1 cup water
1 cup sugar, to taste
1-2 cinnamon sticks, each about 2 in. long
3 cups dry red wine
1 tsp. almond extract or to taste
1 cup light cream
1 cup sour cream or crème fraîche

Put pitted cherries, water, sugar, cinnamon and wine in a large pan. Bring to the boil, reduce heat and simmer for 20-30 minutes until the cherries are tender. Remove from heat and add the almond essence.

In a bowl, stir a few tablespoons of light cream into the sour cream or crème fraîche to thin it down, then stir in the rest until the mixture is smooth. Stir the mixture into the cherry soup, then chill until ready to serve. Serves six.

SUMMER SQUASH AND BABY NEW POTATOES IN WARM DILL SOUR CREAM

14 oz. mixed squash, such as yellow and green zucchini
14 oz. tiny, baby new potatoes pinch of sugar
3-5 tbsp. butter
2 bunches green scallions thinly sliced
1 large bunch fresh dill, finely chopped
1¼ cups sour cream or plain yogurt
salt and ground black pepper

Cut squash into pieces about the same size as potatoes. Put the potatoes in a pan and add water to cover, with the sugar and salt. Bring to the boil, then simmer for about 10 minutes until almost tender. Add the squash and continue to cook until the vegetables are tender. Drain.

Melt the butter in a large pan. Fry scallions until just wilted, then gently stir in the dill and vegetables.

Remove the pan from the heat and stir in the sour cream or yogurt. Return to the heat and heat gently until warm. Season with salt and pepper and serve. Serves 4.

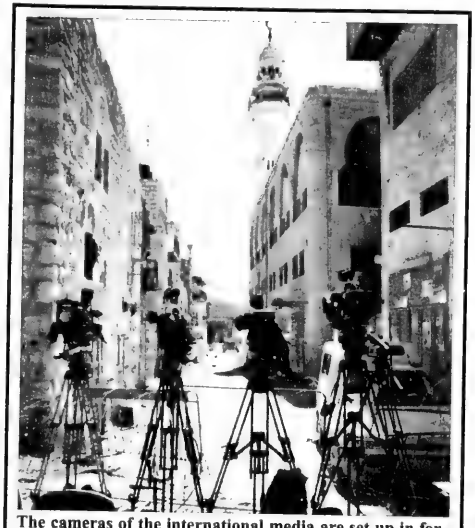
Church standoff set to end, most militiamen to go free

By AMOS HAREL and ANAT CYGIELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer, speaking to the Knesset's Labour faction, said that most of the wanted Palestinians holed up inside Bethlehem's Church of the Nativity would be allowed to go free, while a few would be sent to the Gaza Strip and a small number would be deported.

Ben-Eliezer said Monday afternoon that the month-long standoff was set to end "in the coming hours."



The cameras of the international media are set up in formation near the Church of the Nativity ready to "shoot" the images at a moment's notice. [Isranet photo]

The Palestinians wanted no more than eight of those in the church sent into exile in Italy, while Israel reportedly insisted that at least a dozen be deported, Associated Press reported. Another 30 Palestinian militiamen would be sent to Gaza, Palestinian sources said.

Palestinian officials said early Monday an agreement had been struck to end the standoff. But Israeli sources said that although there had been progress, no deal had been reached.

A U.S. source involved in the talks also said a deal was unlikely to be reached Monday. He said a Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) representative was to join the talks Monday evening, and predicted there would be no solution to the standoff before Tuesday.

At midday Monday, Israel Radio quoted senior Fatah activist Ibrahim Abayat as saying that a solution would be reached within hours.

Ben-Eliezer was quoted Monday as saying he hoped the volatile dispute would end Monday. According to Army Radio, Ben-Eliezer said Israeli troops would leave Bethlehem and nearby Beit Jala immediately after a deal. Israel Radio reported Sunday that Ben-Eliezer was directly involved in the talks.

The reports of progress came as Prime Minister Ariel Sharon arrived in Washington for talks Tuesday with U.S. President George W. Bush.

The winding-down of Israel's West Bank offensive and a U.S.-brokered end last week to Israel's month-long siege of Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's headquarters have raised hopes of breaking the 19-month-old cycle of Israeli-Palestinian violence.

Five of the six candidates for deportation were from Arafat's Fatah faction – among them Abayat, general intelligence commander Abdallah Daud and former preventive security officer Jihad Jara. The sixth is senior Hamas activist Aziz Jubran, Israel Radio reported.

The gunmen fled into the Church of the Nativity, believed to be the birthplace of Jesus, a little over a month ago, at the start of Operation Defensive Shield. Israeli troops have surrounded the church since then, demanding that the militants give themselves up.

The army withdrew two tanks from Manger Square on Sunday, and a wanted Hamas gunman surrendered after being holed up in the church since the army entered Bethlehem six weeks ago.

The key remaining issue, security sources told Ha'aretz, centres on the list of Palestinian suspects: Of the people still in the church, how many are to be included on the list of deportees? The sources said Israel knew about the leading terror suspects who were inside the church compound, but had wanted a list of names so as to decide on its demands regarding lower-level suspects.

New Pension Rights for Ghetto Work in Poland
Up until this time, pensions from the German Social Security System were paid exclusively to workers in the Lodz Ghetto who were subsequently residents in Germany between May 1945 and December 31, 1949. This is being replaced by a new regulation.
1. Pensions will be paid to workers in all Ghettos in Poland, provided they were in the annexed or occupied territories.
2. Work in the Ghettos will in the future be evaluated on a higher scale.
3. A subsequent residence in Germany is no longer required. Also, those who had left Germany as displaced persons after December 31, 1949 will now become eligible.
4. The pensions will be paid retroactively to 1997. (Retirement or widow's pensions).
5. Application must be submitted before June 30, 2003

Sharon: conference can't replace direct talks

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, preparing for his scheduled Tuesday meeting with President George W. Bush, was set to tell the U.S. administration that a proposed regional conference does not need to achieve agreements, and that it should not replace direct talks between Israel and the Palestinians.

The prime minister was to have proposed that only the U.S. mediate the talks. In his view, the regional conference is intended to create "a positive atmosphere of communication."

Sharon proposes holding the regional conference in Turkey, and he objects to Syrian and Lebanese participation, because he says they are not part of the "peace coalition" in the region. Sharon proposes inviting Egypt, Jordan, Morocco and Saudi Arabia.

Sharon was to meet with U.S. Secretary of Defence Donald Rumsfeld on Monday and with Bush on Tuesday.

Education Minister Limor Livnat, who accompanied Sharon to Washington, D.C., was to have presented an intelligence report Monday detailing Saudi support for Palestinian suicide attacks and for Hamas.

The report was based on documents seized recently by Israel in the West Bank.

Livnat was also expected to present new information said to link Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat to support for, and involvement in, terrorism.

But the report on alleged Saudi ties to terror may make it difficult for Sharon to explain his agreement to Saudi participation in the international peace conference planned for this summer while maintaining Arafat should be excluded for supporting terror.

Palestinian Authority Information Minister Yasser Abed Rabbo said Sunday that U.S. National Security Adviser Condoleezza Rice should focus on Israel's treatment of the Palestinians, rather than on documents Sharon will present during his four-day visit, "so that we can work on reforming the Palestinian Authority."

Among the documents reportedly procured by Israel during its month-long West Bank operation was a funding request for Raed Karmi, head of the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, the group responsible for dozens of terror attacks. On it, Arafat writes, "Allocate $600 for each one," and signs his name.

Rice said earlier Sunday the administration had not seen, but would examine, Sharon's documents and would consider the evidence.

Make aliyah, N. African Jews urged

By YAIR SHELEG
Ha'aretz Daily News Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Various organizations are encouraging Moroccan and Tunisian Jews to consider emigrating to Israel after recent attacks on Jews in both countries, especially the Al Qaeda terrorist attack on the ancient synagogue on Djerba island in Tunisia three weeks ago.

An Israeli government source told Ha'aretz that "the disclosure that Osama Bin Laden's organization was behind the attack on Djerba made people fearful, lest this be a dangerous precedent. This is behind the idea to encourage the immigration of Jews from these countries. However, the organizations involved say these are merely initial steps and there is no practical plan for any mass immigration of Moroccan or Tunisian Jews, as Ma'ariv [reported last Sunday]."

Morocco and Tunisia have the largest Jewish communities remaining in the Arab world – 3,000 in Morocco and 1,500 in Tunisia.

At the session of his kitchen cabinet last Friday, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said "we have received reports of the distress suffered by Jews in Morocco and Tunisia, and we are checking to see what can be done to encourage them to come to Israel."

These comments were apparently behind the item in Ma'ariv. Israel lacks official diplomatic ties with Tunisia and Morocco – low-level interest offices with official representatives that opened after the Oslo accords were closed after the outbreak of the second intifadah in September 2000, but some unofficial ties still exist. However, Foreign Ministry and Jewish Agency officials cannot openly encourage immigration of Jews.

A senior Jewish Agency official recently said efforts at this stage would focus on improving absorption conditions for immigrants from these countries to encourage them to come of their own accord.

Jews may leave both countries freely, so no secrecy is needed. Jewish Agency figures show that in 2001, 92 Jews immigrated from Morocco and a few dozen came from Tunisia. Most of the North African immigrants are young single people who came without families.

A social worker at an absorption centre said "it's easier for young people without commitments to come, while those with families find it difficult to leave their professional status and property."

Jewish sources in both countries indicated there are no plans for any mass exodus.

• The army has documented fake burials by Palestinians in Jenin. The army charged the "burials" were part of a propaganda effort in advance of the now-cancelled UN fact-finding mission to the refugee camp. The army presented a film to foreign media that was shot from a military drone on April 28 showing a group of Palestinians carrying a man on a stretcher. The man was covered with a shroud, as if he was a corpse, and among the group accompanying him was a cameraman. But the film shown to the foreign press clearly shows how the stretcher falls and the "corpse" gets up on his own, and then gets back on the stretcher as it advances. After the second fall, the "corpse," apparently disgusted with the incompetence of the stretcher-bearers, walks off in a huff.

May 3

Jewish Argentine radio station faces closure

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The ongoing Argentine economic crisis has delivered a body blow to the country's already struggling Jewish community, pushing many into poverty and prompting numerous inquiries about emigration.

It has also brought one of the community's success stories and a vital community institution to the brink of collapse.

Radio Jai, a 10-year-old privately operated station, is losing $10,000 (US) each month and is in danger of closing, said Miguel Steuermann, founder and executive director of the station.

In an e-mail dispatch from Buenos Aires, Steuermann indicated he is putting out a last-ditch request to supporters around the world to come to the aid of the station, which he describes as one of the community's most important cultural institutions.

The station (www.radiojai.com) was founded in the aftermath of the March 1992 terrorist bombing of the Israeli embassy as "an emotional outlet for a speechless and uncompromising people.

"Over the years the radio [station] has become a rich and pluralistic source for the community," Steuermann said.

With the collapse of the Argentine economy, the station's financial status began to reach a crisis point. "Our sources from advertisement have almost disappeared and we are launching a strong campaign abroad for financial sponsoring... We might close the [station] because we can't get the money to pay the bills."

Much of the money raised abroad to help Argentine Jewry is being channeled to basic needs, like food, housing, health and aliyah, he said.

"Nobody seems to understand that not all the Jews are leaving the country. The community that remains here needs a Jewish radio station to provide non-formal Jewish education, a sense of identity and moral support," he said.

Steuermann, who worked for the Israeli embassies in Chile and Paraguay prior to founding Radio Jai, said the station broadcasts news and cultural programming 24 hours a day. Its most popular program is Pensando las noticias (Thinking the News) and it airs reports from its Israeli correspondent three times a day.

Steuermann estimates the station's audience at 500,000, well over the country's Jewish population of 200,000.

Like the broader population, the Jewish community has been rocked by the downwardly spiralling economy, which has left 30 per cent of Jews unemployed and many living under the poverty line, Steuermann said. (According to a January report in Ha'aretz, about 1,700 Jewish families in Buenos Aires alone are said to have lost their homes, and 300 of them are living in shantytowns, while others are crowded into rented apartments – often several families per flat.)

The community's school system has also been affected. As recently as 1995, 21,000 Jewish youngsters attended Jewish schools. Today, the number is 14,000.

The community's prospects today are a far cry from the optimistic situation of the 1930s, when Argentina was one of the world's richest nations and the Jewish community was one of the most important in the Diaspora.

"It was a time when Buenos Aires had more Jewish theatres than New York. The local Jewish schools were considered among the best in the world," Steuermann said.

"Today, parents cannot afford private schools any more. Middle- and small-size enterprises are disappearing. Needless to say, the mood in the community is absolutely devastated.

"Recent polls [indicate] that 54 per cent of the population wants to leave the country. Many Argentine Jews are indeed leaving, some to the United States, Canada, Brazil, Europe and obviously, Israel."

Even Jews with Polish ancestry are attempting to get Polish citizenship, Steuermann said.

"During the last three months, 3,500 people left for Israel." The Jewish Agency, which is charged with facilitating immigration to Israel, has launched a "most ambitious aliyah program. If the current emigration trend continues, it is estimated that 25,000 Jews are going to be leaving the country."

In addition to its financial hardships, the Jewish community is psychologically unsettled as well, Steuermann said. "Argentina suffered the two most important terrorist attacks directly targeted to Jewish objectives after World War II" – the embassy bombing and the 1994 attack on the AMIA community centre building in Buenos Aires that killed 85 and wounded 300.

"The lack of justice and the fact the perpetrators' identities are not yet known [none of the accused in the currently ongoing AMIA trial is charged with the actual bombing] creates a climate of insecurity, uncertainty and fear of another terrorist attack," Steuermann said.

"Argentina has a long history of anti-Semitism and fascism. Anybody can presume that if the economic situation continues to worsen, a new anti-Semitic wave may appear."

Attack fails to quash spirit of Tunisia's Jews

By JUDITH FEIN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

DJERBA, Tunisia — Jews here carried on with their annual Lag b'Omer celebration last week in spite of a recent terrorist attack that rocked their tiny island community.

The numbers were down from past celebrations, but still hundreds of tourists came to join the 1,000 Jewish Djerbans for the pilgrimage festivities.

"The first moment I heard about the bombing, it was catastrophic for me," a Tunisian Jew who had come from Paris said of the April 11 blast at the historic synagogue here.

But after discovering that the authorities "were doing everything they could to make it safe, I came here two days later. Believe me, I feel safer here than I do in France."

The explosion of a gas truck – fatalities now number 18, including 13 German tourists – was first dismissed by Tunisian authorities as an accident.

But then it became clear it was a deliberate act of terrorism, officials say, and the government has moved quickly to denounce the violence and contain the damage. Tunisian authorities quickly paid to restore the El Ghriba synagogue, which traces its roots back more than 2,000 years.

The government also encouraged and promoted the Lag b'Omer festivities, even inviting foreign journalists to see the reaction, both private and public, of this Muslim nation that prides itself on being a peaceful country.

As they do every year, the Jews sang and danced in the streets. They set a huge menorah on a cart, lovingly draped it with multicoloured scarves, sprayed it with perfumes and wheeled it through the streets.

Their Muslim neighbours came out of their houses to watch and show support.

"The Jews are our brothers," a young Muslim man said proudly, even though he asked that his name not be used. "No matter what our religion, we're all Tunisians."

Jews from all over the world – and especially Tunisians who live in France and Israel – come in droves to celebrate the pilgrimage festival that takes place at El Ghriba, the oldest and most famous synagogue in North Africa.

The Jewish tourist frenzy reached a peak in the year 2000 when more than 8,000 people arrived for Lag b'Omer, which falls on the 33rd day of the period between Passover and Shavuot.

It is difficult to pin down the exact origins of the Jewish community in Djerba, a popular tourist site for Europeans off the coast of the Northern African nation of Tunisia.

Most people concur with the legend that it was first settled by Jews who fled Jerusalem at the time of the destruction of the First Temple in 586 B.C.E. They settled in two separate communities: Hara Kabira and Hara Seghira.

Their descendants still live there today, engaged in a thriving and observant Jewish community, complete with Jewish schools, synagogues and kosher food. For the most part, Tunisian Jews – another 1,000 live in Tunis – have fared better than in most Arab countries. Emigration was always tolerated and there was no state-condoned anti-Semitism.

Yet outbreaks of violence and harassment have periodically upset the peaceful co-existence between Jews and Muslims. Often the tensions were a reflection of the situation in the Mideast.

The bulk of Tunisian Jews, which once numbered 100,000, emigrated to Israel in waves. The first wave came with the establishment of Israel in 1948, then with the end of French rule in 1956, and again in 1967, when the Six-Day War sparked anti-Jewish rioting, despite the relative moderation of the country's then-president, Habib Bourguiba.

In the early 1990s, with the start of the Oslo peace process, Jews here were optimistic about their future.

Indeed, Djerba's Jewish population grew dramatically, as many who had gone to France or Israel returned home.

Tunisia, once the headquarters of the Palestine Liberation Organization and current Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat, was among the Arab countries that established low-level diplomatic relations with Israel in the mid-1990s.

It has since cut those ties.

Jews are cautious about talking openly about the situation. They clearly have strong roots here and appreciate the government's support. But there's an insecurity that is reflected in their reluctance to give their names when talking to journalists.

While Tunisia has expressed support for the Palestinians, it has also lent public support to its Jewish community.

Last week, the minister of culture, Abdelbaki Hermassi, hosted a dinner for the media, foreign dignitaries, Tunisian Jews and others who had gathered for the Lag b'Omer events.

At the end of the traditional Tunisian meal, he stood up and spoke about the artistic collaboration between Muslims and Jews – in cinema, art, and literature.

He said Tunisia loves and honours its Jews and appreciates the contributions they have made to Tunisian society.

The next day, the minister of tourism, Mondher Zenaidi, hosted another dinner. He, too, expressed his personal horror at the attack in Djerba.

This year's pilgrimage was a "victory against obscurantism and fanaticism," he was quoted as saying, as he pledged to protect religious freedoms.

He acknowledged that Tunisia had cut off official diplomatic relations with Israel because of the current Mideast strife, but he insisted this had nothing to do with the situation of Jews in Tunisia.

"Jews and Muslims are brothers," he said. "They are both Tunisians."

European anti-Semitism sets off alarms

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — Synagogues are torched. Jewish cemeteries are desecrated. Jews are roughed up on the street.

The recent wave of anti-Semitic violence in parts of Europe has sounded alarm bells in the Jewish world, prompting some commentators to compare the situation to the run-up to the Holocaust.

Analysis

"Friends in Israel – Israel! – phoned to ask if we were safe," said one mother of two in Paris. "I couldn't believe it."

The upsurge of anti-Semitism has coincided with the conflict in the Middle East and sharply intensified during the past month, when Israel launched a large-scale military operation in the West Bank to round up terrorists.

But the manifestations of anti-Semitism differ from country to country, and there is ample evidence that other elements are involved, too, including a re-emergence of "traditional" religious and racial prejudices against Jews.

"The prejudices are the old ones, but the phenomenon is broader," said Andras Kovacs, an expert on anti-Semitism and nationalism at Budapest's Central European University.

"Being anti-Israel has become somehow 'legitimate' today," he said. This in turn "gives a new 'legitimacy' to the old anti-Semitism."

Why this is happening, what it might portend, and to what extent the trend is linked specifically to the Middle East crisis are matters of pressing concern to individual Jews, Jewish communities and Jewish policymakers.

So, too, is the question of how to confront the volatile new situation without plunging fruitlessly into despair, panic – or paranoia.

"Anti-Semitism, it has been said, is a light sleeper. It would be foolish, and wrong, to underestimate the threat," warned an editorial in the London Jewish Chronicle. "But there is a further danger – to magnify, rather than tackle, the problem."

The problem, in fact, exists on several fronts.

The most visible has been the headline-grabbing spate of violent attacks against synagogues, Jewish institutions and individuals, primarily in France but also in other countries, including Belgium and Germany.

To date, no one has been killed. But the Simon Wiesenthal Center went so far as to issue a travel advisory for Jews heading to France and Belgium.

The European Jewish Congress counted some 360 anti-Jewish incidents in France in the first three weeks of April alone.

According to France's Interior Ministry, more than 60 per cent involved anti-Jewish graffiti or verbal abuse. But there were also a dozen attempts to set synagogues on fire or damage graves.

The attacks were topped off by the shocking success of right-wing extremist Jean-Marie Le Pen in the first round of French presidential elections last week, triggering calls from Israel for French Jews to make mass aliyah.

Most of the attacks were the acts of hitting out at Jews as surrogates for Israel, and were not part of an orchestrated campaign.

But anti-Semitic violence has been coupled with a subtle ideological shift.

Widespread sympathy for the Palestinians and widespread identification of Jews and Judaism with the State of Israel and its policies have opened the door to a growing acceptance of classic anti-Semitic rhetoric in both public discourse and private conversation.

"There is a difference between what's going on in France and Belgium and what's going on in Italy," said Francesco Spagnolo Acht, director of a Jewish music study center in Milan. "In Italy, so far, there has not been any violence. Here, anti-Israel and anti-Semitic opinions are spread by local Italians. It is ideological, but very vocal.

"The debate over Israel/Palestine has given room to a series of anti-Semitic episodes that suggest a clear connection between traditionally left-wing anti-Zionist ideas with the more rooted Catholic anti-Semitic beliefs," he said.

"Thus, even in the national and politically moderate press, the old accusation of murdering Jesus has surfaced. Such accusations and mythologies are also being adopted by the extreme-left newspapers. The mixture is a true Molotov cocktail."

Local politics make the situation even more complex: Leftist pro-Palestinian stances are countered by pro-Israel platforms adopted by the right.

Many Italian Jews are uncomfortable to find that one of Israel's most vocal public supporters is the National Alliance, a party that grew out of the fascist movement.

In part, these trends reflect complex fallout from broader global issues.

These issues include attempts by the European Union to do away with borders and revamp traditional political, social and economic relations.

But they also include worries about economic globalization, the conflict between the Third World and modernity, insecurities and anti-Americanism, particularly following the Sept. 11 attacks and the war in Afghanistan.

"Many Europeans today, especially the citizens of small, unimportant states, feel bewildered and lost," Tony Judt, director of the Remarque Institute at New York University, wrote recently in The New York Times. "Their countries and their institutions have lost their place in a globalizing world economy – and above all in an institutionally homogenized European Union."

In this context, Kovacs said, it has been easy for some to focus on the age-old symbol of borderless, international identity – the Jew.

"There are a lot of concrete political problems now, and all of them can be brought into connection with the Jews and Israel in a way," Kovacs said.

"For those who are anti-Semitic, this is a perfect way to legitimize this attitude," he said. "One symbol unites them – the Jew, the cosmopolitan Jew against nation state, the cosmopolitan Jew bound to America."

Another important factor, he said, is the difficulty in understanding the loyalty felt by Jewish citizens of European countries to another state, Israel.

Jewish leaders, meanwhile, are gearing up for action.

"On many occasions when there is a deterioration in the social fabric, it starts with the Jews, especially here on this continent where there has been a history of anti-Semitism," Avi Beker, secretary-general of the World Jewish Congress, said last week in Brussels.

Beker spoke during a strategy session of international Jewish leaders, who agreed to set up a Jewish information centre to monitor anti-Semitism in Europe and serve as a political voice and lobby for European Jewry.

They also called for a Europe-wide Jewish rally in Brussels on May 29.

Newsworld docs illuminated both sides of the conflict

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Commentary

Responding to the recent upsurge of violence in the Middle East, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (CBC) has upgraded its coverage of the Arab-Israeli dispute, allotting more time to breaking news and background films.

Last week, as tensions in the region eased somewhat, Newsworld carried four documentaries on various aspects of the simmering conflict, past and present.

The Ugly War: Israel Undercover provides a glimpse into an Israeli commando squad whose task is to nip terrorism in the bud.

Suicide as a Weapon is about a Palestinian suicide bomber who killed nine Israelis in Jerusalem recently.

The Accused turns on the 1982 Phalange massacre of Palestinian refugees in the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps, focusing on then-defence minister Ariel Sharon's supposed role.

Arafat: The Struggle for Palestine is a profile of Yasser Arafat, chair of the PLO, president of the Palestinian Authority and one of the fathers of contemporary Palestinian nationalism.

The question to ask is whether Newsworld has lived up to its mandate of presenting both sides in a reasonably balanced manner. Given the generally pro-Palestinian slant of much of the European media, Canadian viewers have a right to know whether their tax-supported broadcaster has succeeded in being fair.

Let's see.

The Ugly War presents Israel in a positive, if jagged, light, and reminds viewers that Israel's war against terrorism began long before last September's destruction by Arab terrorists of the World Trade Center in Manhattan.

The focus is on the Golani brigade, a unit charged with hunting down, apprehending and/or killing terrorists bent on wreaking havoc in Israel.

Soldiers are seen training for future missions, shooting at targets and practising house-to-house urban warfare. The enemy, we're told, is not the Palestinians themselves, but the people who organize the terrorism, supply the weapons and carry out the actual raids.

In a chilling scene, an infrared clip shows a soldier shooting a "ticking bomb" – an armed terrorist – as he attempts to penetrate an Israeli settlement in the Gaza Strip.

Successive scenes, both of which are riveting, show soldiers setting up an ambush, which doesn't pan out, and capturing a Hamas operative. As he is led away from his home after a brief exchange of fire, an angry woman shouts, "You're dogs, you're all dogs."

In addition, The Ugly War, whose tone is measured, allows us to witness a deadly Apache helicopter strike on Abu Hanoud, a Palestinian militant. As the film ends, the commander of the Israeli Air Force, Gen. Dan Haloutz, justifies the operation in terms of Israel's very survival. "We're fighting for our homes," he says emphatically. "It's personal."

Since the outbreak of the current Palestinian uprising, more than 300 Israelis have been killed by suicide bombers. Suicide as a Weapon, a clinical documentary, zeroes in on Muhammed Daragmeh, a 17-year-old youth from a refugee camp recruited by the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, which turned to suicide bombings this past January after one of its leaders was liquidated in an Israeli air strike.

By all accounts, Daragmeh was well-adjusted, quite sociable and loved life. Amer, his older brother, who still can't believe what happened, says he was radicalized by conditions in the camp, his exposure to continual violence and the death of a friend by Israeli fire.

In Palestinian circles, suicide bombers are usually praised as "martyrs." But here, dissident views emerge. One of Daragmeh's friends deplores his action, his grieving mother claims she would have held him back had she known what he was planning and a senior Palestinian official takes firm exception to the tactic. However, Daragmeh's three masked, menacing associates justify suicide bombings on the grounds of "an eye for an eye."

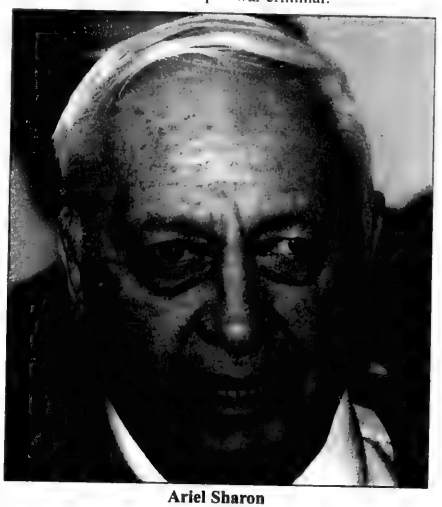
Sharon lost his job as defence minister after being reprimanded by the Kahan Commission. Declaring he should have been aware of the vengeful "culture of murder" in Lebanon, the commission held him indirectly responsible for the grisly events in Sabra and Shatila.

The Accused, which was dropped by the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, tries to prove that Sharon, given his alleged negligence and Israel's brief occupation of West Beirut, is a war criminal.



Ariel Sharon

Morris Draper, an American diplomat who was posted to Beirut, is openly skeptical about Sharon's argument that he could not have anticipated the slaughter. Bashir Gemayel, the Christian president-elect of Lebanon, had just been assassinated, and his militia, the Phalange, sought quick retribution.

Richard Falk, a Princeton scholar not known for pro-Israel sympathies, also points an accusing finger. More telling is the insinuation by Ron Ben Ishai, an Israeli reporter, that Sharon could have stopped the killings, and the suggestion by Richard Goldstone, a United Nations (UN) war crimes prosecutor, that Sharon should have been indicted.

Rushing to Sharon's defence are his lawyer, Dov Weinglass, who attacks Falk's line of argumentation, and his current press spokesman, Ra'anan Gissin, who assumed the Phalange was "a disciplined army."

All this aside, The Accused acknowledges that Israel, being a democracy, even saw fit to establish a special commission to investigate the matter. By contrast, Lebanon issued a curt and nebulous three-page report that settled absolutely nothing.

Haim Divon, Israel's current ambassador to Canada, was offered an opportunity to debate the issue on Counter Spin, which appeared right after The Accused. He declined, claiming that Newsworld had misguidedly and unforgiveably mixed up Sabra and Shatila with the fierce controversy swirling around Israel's recent incursion into the Jenin refugee camp.

Arafat: The Struggle for Palestine is a fairly detached, chronological biography of the Palestinians' most visible and durable political leader. He is portrayed as a driven manoeuvrer who spared no effort or lives to achieve his aims. A top-ranking PLO military commander admits that some of its operations could accurately be described as terrorism. A former UN official observes that the PLO could not have publicized its cause without resorting to terror.

Thrown into the mix are comments by, among others, George Shultz, the former American secretary of state; Shimon Peres, Israel's foreign minister, and Edward Said, a Palestinian intellectual.

This portrait of Arafat, told mainly from the Palestinian viewpoint, takes into account his contributions to Palestinian self-determination, his leadership qualities, his evolving policies and his autocratic tendencies.

The documentaries under review offer a nuanced picture of a complex region in constant flux, illuminating both sides of the conflict. Taken collectively, they add to our knowledge and understanding of the ever-changing Middle East.

FELDBERG COLLECTION COMING TO BARNICKE GALLERY

Acquired in Berlin in the 1920s, the Siegbert and Hildegard Feldberg collection of self-portraits contains works by Kathe Kollwitz, Oskar Kokoschka, Josef Oppenheimer and Max Liebermann and other artists attached to the Berlin Secession, a group that was outspoken in its opposition to Germany's conservative official esthetics of the time.

When the Feldbergs were forced to flee Berlin with their two sons in the 1930s, the collection went with them, travelling in an iron box. The family lived in India until the 1960s. This exhibition is mounted as a tribute to Hildegard Feldberg, who retired to Canada and died here in 1996. It is the first public showing anywhere.

Justina M. Barnicke Gallery, Hart House, University of Toronto. May 25 to June 20. 416-978-8398. The exhibition is presented as part of the First Canadian-German Festival, Toronto 2002. www.canadiangermanfestival.ca.

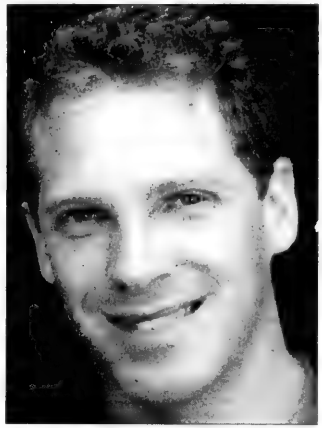
Red Barn Theatre: Canada's oldest known summer stock theatre is located one hour north of Toronto at Jackson's Point on Lake Simcoe. The Red Barn is more than 50 years old and has long been a showcase for rising stars.



Jordan Merkur

This year the theatre boasts a new artistic director, Jordan Merkur, and a new partnership with York University for set construction. Its summer season opens June 6 with comedian Dave Broadfoot's First Farewell Tour (to June 8).

Merkur directs three productions this season, Over The River and Through The Woods, a comedy about two sets of meddling grandparents, runs June 18 to July 6.

The Foursome, Norm Foster's golf comedy, runs Aug. 7 to 24. And Sophie Tucker Last of the Red Hot Mamas, the musical by Valerie Boyle, runs Aug. 28 to Sept. 14.

The Red Barn is also presenting a production of I Love You, You're Perfect, Now Change, the musical comedy about relationships, directed by Diane Nyland-Proctor. July 10 to Aug. 3. Box office, 1-888-RED-BARN. Web site, www.redbarntheatre.ca.

Correct dates for Feldberg art collection

The story "Legendary art collection from Weimar Germany" (CJN, April 25) included incorrect dates. The Feldberg art collection will be exhibited as part of the first Canadian-German festival May 23 to June 20, not April 25 to June 10 as stated in the article. We regret any inconvenience this may have caused.

NEW MIDEAST DOC: The new documentary film Conflict examines the current situation in Israel through the eyes of 22-year-old filmmaker Elad Winkler.

Conflict follows director Winkler as he returns to his homeland and interviews Jewish survivors of violence, Palestinian and Israeli government officials, civilians and artists.

The 35-minute film looks at both the beauty and ugliness of Israel, revealing the human suffering behind the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and the day-to-day lives of those who live in the region.

Winkler is currently finishing his final year at Ryerson University's film program. Conflict, which is produced by Ryan Silverman for Wink Films, will be being screened at the Bloor Cinema (506 Bloor St. W.) on May 11 at 7 p.m. as part of the FLIM Festival, Ryerson's annual film festival for graduating students.

TORONTO — The Pettle brothers, Adam, 30, and Jordan, 28, are working together again.

The one-act drama Therac 25 features the two Jewish artists, Adam acting, Jordan directing.

The play, which runs about 45 minutes, is about two cancer patients, Allan (Adam Pettle) and Moira (Patricia Fagin), who meet while they are undergoing treatment at the Princess Margaret Hospital in Toronto, and fall in love against a background of high-tech medical sounds that lend realism to the story.

At Factory Studio Theatre (125 Bathurst St., at the corner of Adelaide Street) until May 19, this is the first Toronto production of Therac 25 since it was staged as part of the Fringe Festival four years ago.

Jordan Pettle, the director, meanwhile also has the lead role in Zadie's Shoes, written by brother Adam and currently running at the Winter Garden.

The two spend so much time together that they finish each other's sentences.

Adam Pettle says his role in Therac 25 is in some ways too close to reality, since he had cancer of the thyroid gland, was treated in Halifax and temporarily lost the use of his vocal chords. This drama gives him a chance to use his voice in a way that clearly demonstrates the success of his treatment.

Moira, on the other hand, has a neuroblastoma, which spreads through her spinal fluid to her brain and is untreatable. The final scene is a moving one, in which, for the first time, Moira admits she is scared of what lies ahead.

The playwright has transferred the action to Princess Margaret Hospital in Toronto from Halifax, site of the original play. The title, Therac 25, refers to a computerized radiation treatment used for some cancers; the area of Princess Margaret where the couple meet is known as the Therac 25 corridor.

It is not surprising, then, that the drama is totally believable, especially the seizure that overcomes Moira toward the end.

Most young playwrights have no hesitation about using obscenities and references to masturbation, which usually do not add much to a play, but since the two cancer patients are both young, the language adds reality here.

One distraction for this reviewer was the use of the two actors to shift scenery around in the dark between scenes. This led to awkward entrances and exits for Allan and Moira. The one exception was the scene where a nurse appears to adjust and leave an intravenous fluid flowing into Moira's arm, which was very effective.

Play dramatizes Matti's story from killer's perspective

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — In 1998, Marcello Cabezas had an awakening and decided to quit the world of advertising for life as a performance artist. He has since formed a production company macIDeas with partner Steven Moore.

The company's first endeavour is the world premiere of Jodi Miller's one-man multimedia theatrical production Vladeck, in which Cabezas stars, running June 1 to June 16 at Buddies In Bad Times Theatre, 12 Alexander Street, Toronto.

Vladeck was written in honour of young Matti Baranovski, beaten to death by a teen gang, ostensibly over some loose change and cigarettes, at a Toronto park in November 1999.

"The piece was written by Jodi Miller, who was a supply teacher at Matti Baranovski's high school, Northview Heights. She was very inspired by this story. Although a real incident of violence was the catalyst, the play Vladeck is entirely fictional," says Cabezas.

"It tells the story from one of the perpetrators' perspective. Vladeck is the narrator. He is the underdog, very much influenced by what the leader of the gang Ginisi has to say. Vladeck is being egged on by his friends.

"The point of the piece is that you can commit an act, but you have to understand what the consequences are and that there is no turning back. Vladeck is someone who ends up taking responsibility for what he has done," he says.

"Why we wanted to move forward on Vladeck is because it puts theatre on another tier. Using it as a real education vehicle. We're not being preachy, but illustrating and bringing to life the journey of one of the perpetrators and how he deals with what he's done," Cabezas adds.

Cabezas says he formed his production company to produce theatre that challenges people to think and to examine who they are.

"I feel strongly about Vladeck's message – it does not try to rationalize why, just tell his story. I want to work hard to have as many people see the project as possible. It has a strong anti-youth violence message. To be able to use theatre to inspire discussion, that excites me," he says.

During the Toronto run, additional daytime performances of Vladeck will be offered to school groups. On June 9, an evening benefit will aid three charities – Leave Out Violence, Kids Help Phone and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services youth programs.

After leaving the advertising industry, Cabezas moved to New York City. The Toronto-born actor enrolled at Neighborhood Playhouse School of the Theatre, and after graduating, he began a writing internship at Ensemble Studio Theatre. He later worked in New York as an actor; his most memorable role was in a production called WC at KGB Theatre, which garnered an Overall Excellence Award at the 2000 New York International Fringe Festival.

"What I want is to be defined as a storyteller. It could be as an actor, producer, or a writer. It's about finding stories that challenge the way people think," Cabezas explains.

Feelings of homesickness and the promise of work brought Cabezas back to Toronto in 2000. His theatre credits here include Beirut, Lab Cabs and A Streetcar Named Desire. Cabezas has also appeared in television and movies, most recently in Blue Murder and Tracker.

Moore and Cabezas will present their second theatrical production, the Canadian premiere of Kenneth Lonergan's This Is Our Youth, in conjunction with Spoke Productions at CanStage's Berkley Street Theatre from Sept. 9 to Oct. 12. Cabezas also plans to tour with Vladeck.

For tickets to Vladeck call the Buddies in Bad Times box office at 416-975-8555.

A jolting dose of culture shock along the Ganges River

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

VARANASI — Ghats, stone stairways that march down to the water's edge, define the character of this holy city in northern India.

Described by 19th-century American novelist Mark Twain as "older than history," Varanasi, which stretches along the western bank of the Ganges River, has been a centre of learning and religion for some 2,000 years.

Formerly known as Kashi and Benares, Varanasi attracts legions of pilgrims. They come here directly from Varanasi's fetid railway station, intent on washing away their sins in the Ganges, or, if they are terminally ill, to die.

Dressed in simple swimsuits or elaborately coloured saris, Indian men, women and children bathe in the Ganges, which is sacred to Hinduism and one of the world's most polluted rivers.

There are about 100 ghats in Varanasi, all connected to the warren of dirt lanes, crumbling dwellings and hole-in-the-wall shops of the labyrinthine, somewhat medieval old city.

Two of the ghats, the so-called burning ghats, are used to cremate corpses on funeral pyres.

Hindus believe that Varanasi offers moksha, liberation from the cycle of life and death. And so, hopelessly ill Indians travel to Varanasi to draw their last breath before being cremated in public.

Deceased males are wrapped in a white garment, while females are clad in red. The body, having been borne to the ghats on a bamboo stretcher, is dipped in the Ganges, then placed on a pyre attended to by doms, or low-caste Indians.

The pyre is lit and stoked with a long stick; occasionally, a dom throws chips of sandalwood into the flames.

Black smoke pours from the pyre, and in three hours, the corpse is reduced to ash, then eventually shovelled into the Ganges.

To a western traveller, the ceremony is awesome and stomach-turning, generating a case of jolting culture shock.

But it doesn't stop there.

Just metres away from the mounds of ash, laundry workers soak clothes in the water before beating the dirt out of them on stone slabs. Having cleaned the garments, they let them dry in the hot sun.

In close proximity to the washermen, pilgrims bathe and brush their teeth in the appallingly filthy water.

Tourists are welcome to watch these timeless rituals of life and death, but are forbidden to take photographs of the burning ghats.

Water-logged during the monsoon season from June to September, the ghats are a magnet for tourists, touts, beggars, aging hippies sporting ponytails, and austere sadhus, Hindu holy men who have renounced all wordly possessions.

The ghats are also the preserve of cows, water buffaloes and scrawny stray dogs.

Varanasi's bustling outdoor bazaar, consisting of a maze of dark, narrow lanes, is a Malthusian, chaotic madhouse. The fruit and vegetable markets are redolent of a thousand mingled odours.

The shops offer the finest iridescent silks in India, produced in grimy, gloomy Dickensian workshops whose workers toil at looms for minimum wages.

In economic terms, they are probably on a par with Varanasi's rickshaw drivers and street barbers, who barely eke out a living.

Benares Hindu University, a 15-minute walk from the centre of town, is well worth visiting.

The leafy campus, graced by tropical vegetation, is a tranquil refuge from Varanasi's frenetic pace.

The art museum, featuring Mogul miniature prints and photographs of early 20th- and 19th-century Varanasi, is of particular interest.

At a Hindu temple near the university, I caught the sight of what looked like a swastika. It was, in fact, an ancient Hindu symbol.

A final note about Varanasi:

If you expect to wake up at the crack of noon, forget it. At about 5 a.m., the morning stillness is abruptly broken by the low, endlessly repeated chants of "Hare Krishna, Krishna Hare."

Day in and day out.

Parents urged to confront eating disorders

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — More than 14 years after Marni Lokash has recovered from anorexia nervosa, she still wonders if she will slip back.

"I still have to think about eating and exercising to be healthy," Lokash said at a symposium on eating disorders sponsored by Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, New Leadership Division; Kolel: the Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning; and the Canada-Israel Institute for Sports and Health Education.

Also at the symposium was Ann Kerr, program director, Sheena's Place and assistant professor, department of psychiatry, University of Toronto; Melissa Lieberman, psychologist, pediatric eating disorders program, McMaster Children's Hospital; and Eitan Gur, senior psychiatrist, Hadassah Hebrew University Medical Centre, and director of the Walter Schindler Centre for Medical Psychotherapy.

Moderator was Paul Garfinkel, president and CEO, Centre for Addiction and Mental Health, and professor, department of psychiatry, University of Toronto.

Lokash says she became anorexic when she was 14 and began getting over it when she was 16, but it took until her early 20s to completely recover, "if I am ever recovered," she said.

She said she still does not understand how children get themselves into that situation. "I look at them and I think, How did I not eat? How did I function? It is not a way any girl should live."

It is important to understand the big role a family plays in the disease, said Lokash. "My older sister was a gymnast, and from an early age I always saw her dieting. An emphasis on my appearance started young, and it became ingrained."

She also matured earlier than other girls, she said, and as a result, felt larger than them. "I felt uncomfortable when I looked in the mirror. When my parents divorced, that added to my low self-esteem.

"I fell into a trap. Every time I looked in the mirror, I saw the same shape, so I began lowering my weight goal."

She was hospitalized at age 15 after being sent home from camp because she refused to eat.

"My recovery did not begin, however, until we were on a family vacation and I saw everyone eating and having a good time. It hit me that this is how life should be. Food is an important part of life."

It took time to learn what a proper meal and snack were, she said, but by age 17, "I was beginning to feel good. It [certainly] did not happen overnight."

Today, she said, she talks to adolescents and teaches them to "embrace and celebrate their bodies."

Kerr said the prevalence of eating disorders has a lot to do with current culture. "We must think about how we bring culture into our home. Many girls feel tremendous pressure to control what they eat in order to look a certain way. We must go against those norms and resist dieting."

Various factors place girls at risk of developing an eating disorder, said Lieberman.

"There is not one pattern. Each person presents in their own way, and most do not start off overweight."

Many patients have a predisposition for perfection, she said. "Their standards are too high. Others have low self-esteem and they want to please and impress others. They are so driven to please, they lose sense of who they are."

Girls may feel they need to lose weight in order to feel accepted.

Warning signs include excessive dieting and exercising, or a pre-occupation with food. "They may cook a lot and not eat the food, cut their food up into tiny pieces before eating, or eat very slowly. They may also complain about not feeling well after they eat."

Girls who become vegetarian are at a greater risk of developing eating disorders, said Lieberman.

Anorexic girls may feel cold, have skin or hair abnormalities, or stop menstruating. They may also faint or feel tired and lethargic.

In Israel, Gur said, "Dieting is the national sport."

Girls start dieting early – he has seen nine-year old patients – and by age 11 about one-quarter of them are restricting their food intake, he said.

In a current research project in which he follows high school students up until they enter the army, he discovered that out of 2,000 students, 10 per cent had an eating disorder.

"We also have to take into account that some students will hide their symptoms."

The fact that many students have an eating disorder was not a surprise, said Gur, "but what was a surprise was that a significant number of the students were boys. The male-female ratio was about 1-3, and there was no difference in their patterns of behaviour."

Garfinkel warned the audience that parents cannot run away from their child's problem. "It is a family affair and eating disorders cannot be ignored no matter how unpleasant they may be.

"You must seek help; silence can be fatal," he said.

Organ donation not contrary to Jewish law, says rabbi

By ERIN SILVER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The need for organ donations in Ontario is immense, but many people are afraid to help.

In Ontario, over 16,000 people are waiting for a transplant donor, while in Canada, rates of organ donation are among the lowest in western nations.

That need was a major concern raised at the Beth Tikvah, Hesed and Social Action Committees recent program, titled Organ Donation – A Jewish Perspective, held during Health Canada's National Organ and Tissue Donor Awareness Week.

"When it comes to Jewish ethical considerations, Jews scratch their collective heads," said Rabbi Wayne Allen, one of six panellists at the program.

Rabbi Allen, who discussed two types of organ donations: cadavarial (from the dead) and live (from the living), said, "According to tradition, Jews are not supposed to desecrate the human body, even after death.

"That is why we limit autopsies and don't view the bodies. This is how the removal of organs can be construed as going against tradition," he said.

"According to the Torah, we're supposed to bury the bodies promptly, within 24 hours. With organ donation, there may be a delay because it would have to wait until after surgery," he said.

"But the need to save a life trumps all other concerns. In Judaism, we have a mandate to heal. We're trained to realize that we have to fix what goes wrong and to alleviate pain," he said.

"In sum, our tradition argues that when we can save a life and donate organs from the dead, we have an obligation which trumps all other concerns, though we must ensure the body is treated respectfully."

Live donor transplantation depends on the risk to the donor, he said.

"The Torah says that we can't stand idly by and watch people die. We must intervene and help," said Rabbi Allen.

"But may a person put oneself in jeopardy to save a life?" he asked.

"We can donate an organ if it's a backup and we have two," but one should not submit themselves to greater risk than the one in danger to save a life.

Rabbi Allen and the other panellists encouraged members of the audience to discuss their wishes with their families.

"You can sign a donor card, but the card doesn't allow for [consideration of] the concerns of Judaism," said Rabbi Allen. "It's better to advocate through your family than a card."

Furthermore, an organ donation card is not a binding document. It must be found on the body and it must be persuasive, which means that the family must agree that these were the wishes of the deceased. Indicating wishes in a will is also pointless, panellists agreed, as the will can be read two weeks after burial. Thus, communication with family is paramount.

Nancy Lee and Dale Doige told the story of their son Ryan, who died suddenly at the age of 10. The donation of his organs helped save or improve the lives of seven other people. Andrea Horowitz lived to tell how she survived two organ replacement surgeries in three months. She said she will be forever grateful for the heroes who donated their liver and gave her a second and third chance at life.

Health advocacy group for seniors to hold benefit

TORONTO — A new organization to help improve seniors' access to high quality health care and help them navigate the medical maze of hospitals and caregiving will hold its first annual benefit on May 23.

Co-sponsored by the University of Toronto's faculty of social work the benefit will feature a pre-performance buffet dinner and performances by the Downchild Blues Band and Canadian comedians Alex Nussbaum, Carilynn Nicholson, Leanne Stewart and Les Aaron. It will be hosted by broadcaster Jane Hawtin.

Created by David Globerman and launched in October 1999, the Running to Daylight Foundation is a tribute to David's late father, Ben, who died on Yom Kippur in 1996, following what the family has described as "dehumanizing and sub-standard medical care" at an Ottawa hospital.

The foundation's goal is to provide the elderly in Toronto and Ottawa with highly trained professional patient representatives, who, at the request of the patient and family, will confer with the health-care team while the patient is in hospital, in a long-term-care facility or in the community to review the patient's treatment and care and work to resolve outstanding issues.

The foundation is also committed to providing public education, fostering research and participating in the development of public policy.

Advance tickets are $60 for the performance and dessert reception and $85 for the pre-event buffet, performance and dessert reception. They can be ordered online at www.ticketking.com or by calling 416-872-1212 or 1-800-461-3333. Tickets at the door are $70 for the performance and dessert reception and are available at the Bloor Cinema box office on May 23 from 4 to 5 p.m. and 7 to 8 p.m.

Jews cheer Le Pen loss, fears for future remain

By ANDREW DIAMOND
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — Eric Sarfaty, who is active in the Jewish community here, says French Jews are happy that far-right leader Jean-Marie Le Pen was trounced in France's second-round presidential elections last Sunday, although the relief is mixed with some fear.

"Many people I have spoken with over the past weeks feel that incumbent President Jacques Chirac is very friendly with the Arab states and has a lot of support in the Muslim community here," Sarfaty said. "So there is the perception that with his election things may get worse – that there will be more attacks against synagogues and schools by Arab youths."

Chirac's victory in Sunday's runoff does not end the problem of how government and society should react to the wave of anti-Semitic attacks that swept France in recent months, French Jewish leaders said.

Chirac received about 82 per cent of the vote, with some 18 per cent going to Le Pen, according to exit polls. In the April 21 first-round vote, Le Pen finished second among 11 candidates, with about 17 per cent of the ballots.

Le Pen's vote count is still worrisome, said Abraham Foxman, national director of B'nai Brith's Anti-Defamation League.

"While the good news is that the French people overwhelmingly rejected the candidacy of Jean-Marie Le Pen, the bad news is that one out of five people accepted his message of hate," Foxman said in a statement. "The challenge for President Chirac is to lead his country away from the message of hate and toward a more accepting society."

Over the past several months, the Jewish community has been disappointed by the French government's weak reaction to anti-Semitic aggression, carried out mainly by Arab youths inflamed by Israeli-Palestinian violence.

Yet most did not think the alternative would be Le Pen, a far-rightist who has a history of making anti-Semitic statements and favours stricter controls on North African immigration to France.

Immediately after first-round results showed Le Pen in the runoff, half a million French citizens took to the streets to say "no" to the Nazism, fascism, xenophobia and anti-Semitism that critics say Le Pen's National Front party represents. On May 1, up to one million anti-Le Pen demonstrators turned out throughout France, including at least 400,000 in Paris.

As a result of that sense of crisis, Sunday's turnout was estimated at 80 per cent of eligible voters.

Despite the demonstrations, French Jews remain worried about the anti-Semitic attacks, which have been the worst in France since World War II, some Jewish officials said.

"It is hard to know whether the attacks will resume after this is all over," said Samuel, 32, a computer software engineer in Paris. "If they do, though, I think the government will act more aggressively to find and punish those behind them. There is a feeling now that things got out of hand in the weeks before the election, and that is why the right did so well."

Many Muslims, who recognized that they and the Jews had a common enemy in Le Pen, "became more involved in the problem of anti-Semitism during the past few weeks," Samuel said. But, he added, "I'm not sure that these were the people who had anything to do with the attacks in the first place. I suppose we can only hope that the feelings of unity will spread."

Though voters from both the left and the right supported Chirac on Sunday, there was evidence that the breather from France's normally acrimonious partisan politics was only temporary.

Many French voters, particularly those on the left, were uninspired by either of the two main candidates – Chirac and the Socialist party's prime minister, Lionel Jospin – in the first round. As a result, many voted for fringe parties or sat out the vote. That apathy allowed Le Pen to squeak by Jospin to qualify for the runoff.

French media – and Jospin himself – urged these voters to back Chirac in the runoff, despite reports linking Chirac to corruption.

Fears that Sunday's vote does not mean Le Pen is finished are heightened by concerns about the upcoming legislative elections. If the Socialist party, galvanized by Jospin's shocking defeat, wins those elections, the result could be a political paralysis that might again lead voters to Le Pen.

"Everything depends now upon the next weeks," Sarfaty said.

Le Pen, 73, once dismissed the Nazi gas chambers as just a "detail" of history. In this campaign, however, he toned down his anti-Semitic rhetoric in favour of a populist crusade against the status quo, patriotic cries for restoring the franc as French's currency and a xenophobic ideology, including a proposal that illegal aliens be placed in transit camps to await deportation.

Reactions focus of sports photographer's debut exhibit

By ADAM BELLO
Special to The CJN

THORNHILL, Ont. — For Shawn Jordan, sports photography has as much to do with capturing reactions as it does with the play itself.

"How players and fans react to a crucial moment in the game is sometimes more telling than the action," says the 26-year-old sports photographer.

"Photographing sports is about shooting the unexpected, so it forces you to become a quicker study of human nature," he says.

Communicating competitive intensity from the perspective of such major sports figures as Tiger Woods, Serena Williams and the Raptors' Vince Carter, is the focus of Jordan's show, A Vision of Sport, running until May 26 at Wayne Gretzky's Restaurant.

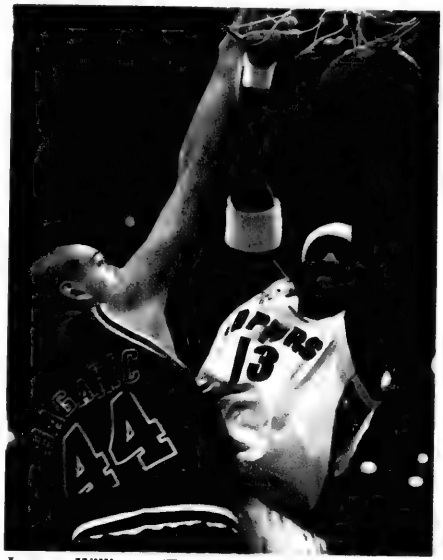
The show was selected as part of the Toronto photography festival, Contact 2002 (www.contactphoto.com).

It covers images from a variety of professional sporting events over the last two years, notably the Canadian Open Golf Tournament, Molson Indy CART race, Master's series ATP Tennis Tournament, and ongoing coverage of Toronto teams such as Raptors, Rock, Phantoms, and Argonauts.

Toronto athletes featured in Jordan's work include squash player Jonathan Power, currently number two in world ranking, and doubles tennis player David Nestor.

"Wayne Gretzky's was very open to host my work. We all felt that this was an ideal venue for a showcase of sports photographs," he says.

While Jordan's coverage of local competitive events in Toronto has led to over 200 published photos in Toronto press and American publications through wire service syndication, the show marks his formal debut as a visual artist.



Jerome Williams (Toronto Raptors) from Shawn Jordan's A Vision of Sport, running May 5th to 26th at Wayne Gretzky's Restaurant.

"The art of sports photography is the art of storytelling, because what [the viewer] interprets is ultimately the tale being told," he says.

"A good action shot draws the viewer in with intrigue about what led up to that moment, and what happened next."

Photography is also a passion that runs through the Jordan family. His father Michael, himself an accomplished travel photographer and writer, fostered Shawn's interest and professional development.

"My father introduced me to photography at a young age. Later in life, I decided to combine it with my interest in sports. It was during university that I had the opportunity to cover sport meets for campus newspapers, and realized I had found my niche."

After receiving his degree in psychology from Carleton University in Ottawa, Jordan became a freelance photographer.

He says there are not enough historical photographic collections of Jewish Canadian sports coverage, either of its figures, or the struggles for mainstream acceptance.

"There is a definite lack of photographic history when it comes to Jewish sports figures," he says.

"In the community, we need a permanent, public collection of their accomplishments, and [we should] bring forward what kind of discrimination Jewish athletes have had to overcome, such as at Christie Pitts [in reference to the 1933 riot instigated by an organized group of fascists on a group of Jews playing baseball in Christie Pitts Park], and how we persevered.

"As my career continues, I would like to consciously build up my collection of Jewish athletes I have photographed, and help solidify the Jewish identity in professional sports."

Maccabi TA loses in European final four basketball

BOLOGNA — Maccabi Tel Aviv reached the final four but couldn't get past Panathinaikos Athens, losing 83 to 75 in the prestigious Euroleague basketball semi-final last week.

Maccabi Tel Aviv was favoured going into the game, having crushed Spanish outfit Tau Vitoria by 29 points three weeks ago and dominating under the baskets.

Panathinaikos and Maccabi had tangled several times before. The Greeks, with the help of Oded Katash, who left Maccabi one season before, beat Maccabi in the final of the 2000 Final Four in Thessalonika. Last year, Maccabi got its revenge in the SuproLeague Final Four in Paris.

Israel's national soccer team coach resigns

By ORI LEWIS
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — The coach of Israel's national soccer team announced last week he would not be staying on after his contract expires this summer.

Richard Nielsen, a Dane, reading a written statement to a stunned news conference in Tel Aviv, said he was very flattered but had decided to turn down an offer to continue for another two years because he felt he had not succeeded in his job.

Under Nielsen, Israel failed to qualify from its group for the playoff round of the World Cup after the team conceded a late goal to draw with Austria at home. The Austrians subsequently lost to Turkey in the playoffs.

"I think I have had my chance but have not taken it," Nielsen said. "I feel responsible that we only managed a draw against Austria and that we lost to Germany and Denmark."

In recent friendlies, Israel equaled its worst-ever defeat when the team lost 7-1 to Germany and then had another poor display in a 3-1 defeat to Denmark last month.

יעל זליגר

אבא בורח עם הקרקס, מאת: אתגר קרת

שוב החלטתי לכתוב על משהו שמעלה חיוך. עצוב לנו, לכולנו ואין רואים עדיין את האור. אבל לחייך מותר ואולי אף צריך.

בימים קשים אלה יש צורך בהמון הבנה וסובלנות וכן יש צורך ביכולת להפליג על גלי הדמיון ולצייר עולם בדיוני, חביב יותר. מקום שאפשר לברוח אליו, ולו רק לפעמים.

Ella's Roasted Eggplant Rolls

2 tbsp. canola oil
1 eggplant peeled, sliced lengthwise 1/4" slices
1/2 cup chopped onion
1 can (16oz) diced tomatoes with juice
1 cup ricotta cheese
1 cup spinach, chopped
1/4 cup mozzarella cheese
1 tbsp. dried basil
1 tbsp. dried oregano
1 tsp. garlic powder
1 cup tomato sauce

Preheat oven to 350°F. Brush 1 tbsp. oil on eggplant slices: roast 15 min. Sauté onion in remaining 1 tbsp. oil 3-4 min. Add tomatoes; simmer 15 min. In a separate bowl, mix ricotta, spinach, mozzarella, basil, oregano, and garlic. Add salt and pepper to taste. Lightly coat a baking dish with cooking spray. Spoon cheese mixture on each slice of eggplant, and roll up like a jelly roll. Place eggplant rolls in the dish. Continue until all the eggplant is used. Top with the tomato sauce, and bake for 30 min Makes 4 servings.

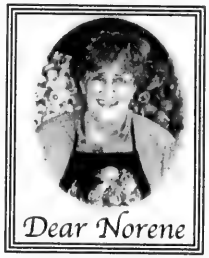
About Food



By NORENE GILLETZ

This year, Mother's Day is May 12. Instead of standing in line at a noisy restaurant, here are some easy brunch ideas.

To minimize cleanup, use disposable plates, cups, cutlery and napkins. Set the table in advance and order a centrepiece of Mom's favourite flowers. Buy some ready-made spreads such as hummus, tzadziki and eggplant. Spread tuna, salmon and chopped egg fillings on coloured tortillas, roll up and cut into 3/4-inch slices for party pinwheel sandwiches.

Try this terrific, easy brunch dish – cinnamon toast, French toast and bread pudding all rolled into one. Assemble it in advance and pop it into the oven shortly before guests arrive. It comes from Canadian Living Cooks Step by Step (Random House, $39.95, colour photos) by multi-talented Toronto cookbook author Daphna Rabinovitch, who is also the co-host of Canadian Living Cooks on the Food Network. It makes a marvelous Mother's Day treat for the whole family to enjoy!

CINNAMON TOAST STRATA WITH MAPLE APPLE TOPPING

Strata:

10 slices square egg bread (challah)
1/4 cup butter, softened
3 tbsp. granulated sugar
1/2 tsp. cinnamon
1 1/2 cups milk
4 eggs
1 tbsp. granulated sugar mixed with 1/2 tsp. cinnamon

Maple Apple Topping:

2/3 cup maple syrup
1/2 cup orange juice
1/4 cup packed brown sugar
2 tbsp. butter (optional)
5 tart apples, peeled, cored and thinly sliced
2/3 cup raisins
1 tbsp. cornstarch

Strata:

Trim crusts from bread. In small bowl, mix together butter, sugar and cinnamon. Spread on 5 of the bread slices; top with remaining slices. Cut diagonally into quarters to make triangles.

Arrange triangles, longest side down, overlapping and curving, around edge of greased 11x7-inch baking dish, curving slightly to fit; arrange remaining triangles in centre.

Whisk milk with eggs until blended; pour evenly over triangles in dish. Sprinkle with cinnamon-sugar. (Can be prepared in advance to this point, covered and refrigerated up to 12 hours.) Let stand at room temperature for 30 minutes.

Preheat oven to 350. Bake uncovered about 45 minutes, or until puffed and golden. Let stand on rack for 10 minutes.

Maple Apple Topping:

Meanwhile, in skillet, whisk together maple syrup, orange juice and sugar; bring to boil over medium-high heat. Add butter (if using). Boil for 1 minute.

Add apples and raisins, cover and cook, stirring once, for 5 minutes or until apples are tender. Dissolve cornstarch in 1 tbsp. water; add to skillet and cook, stirring constantly, for 1 minute or until thickened. Serve warm over strata. Makes 6 servings.

MOUNT SINAI HOSPITAL

The Best Medicine

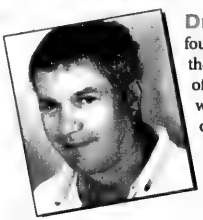
YOUR HOSPITAL, YOUR NEWS

"We proudly begin a series that will spotlight our talented staff. We are grateful to the community for your support as it enables our staff to provide 'The Best Medicine.' In this update, we focus on two eminent clinicians and academics that exemplify Mount Sinai's standards of excellence. In future updates, we will profile other members of the Sinai healthcare team."

Joseph Mapa, President and CEO, Mount Sinai Hospital

SPOTLIGHTING Our Talent!

Dr. Zane Cohen Entering into an unprecedented third term as Surgeon-in-Chief at Mount Sinai, Dr. Zane Cohen is also Chair of the Division of General Surgery at the University of Toronto. Under his leadership, our department of surgery has developed into a world class centre. Dr. Cohen has launched a project that is part of the Leadership Sinai Advanced Surgical Technology Centre. This project allows surgeons at Mount Sinai Hospital to demonstrate skills to countless professionals worldwide. "This project is yet another breakthrough in the way we perform surgery and teach future surgeons," he explains.



Dr. Allan Detsky Dr. Detsky has been our Physician-in-Chief for the last four years bringing leadership and his philosophy to the development and growth of the department of medicine. He is a graduate of Harvard and MIT and a member of the editorial board of the New England Journal of Medicine. Dr. Detsky takes what can be described as a holistic approach to teaching and learning. In Allan's own words, "You can't be a teaching hospital unless you provide a full range of activity. Teaching must be integrated into research. The two feed on each other to give you the best patient care." His research focuses on clinical epidemiology, health economics and policy, decision analysis, clinical nutrition, and cardiology.

"Doctors Detsky and Cohen have a tremendously exciting influence on the culture throughout this hospital," says Joseph Mapa. "They nurture a quest for learning, research, and the incredible satisfaction of providing the best patient care."

UJA FEDERATION
ISRAEL EMERGENCY CAMPAIGN 2003

Israel, we're with you

Your participation in the UJA FEDERATION Walk with Israel
– beginning and ending at SkyDome –
this year is about more than just having a good time ... it's about showing the people of Israel they are not alone. It's essential to let them know that Toronto stands with Israel ... MORE THAN EVER!

This year's Walk with Israel features great fun, great food, and entertainment to please everyone.

This year there's even an Israeli-style shuk (open-air market) to enjoy. Combine that with the best of Mandell Entertainment, a Sony Playstation 2 Demo Vehicle, an Israeli Rock concert with Toronto's Bais Groove, carnival games, and much, much more!

There are also more prizes than ever at this year's Walk including: 2 airline tickets to Israel courtesy of EL AL Israel Airlines, a Sony Playstation 2, Roots gift certificates, a Sanyo CD Walkman, Spin Master Toys, plus T-shirts (with a minimum sponsorship of $36).

If you become a CHAI Walker (raise $1,800 or more), you will receive prize choices and a plaque, and you'll even be invited onto the main stage at Roundhouse Park where you'll be featured as one of our most valued walkers.

... and we'll be there

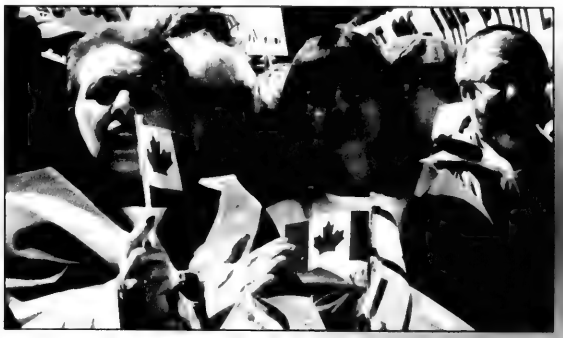
UJA FEDERATION
ISRAEL
EMERGENCY
CAMPAIGN 2003

Now. More than ever ... ISRAEL Needs Us!



For almost two years Israel has been facing some of the darkest days in her history.

Relentless terror has stretched Israel's social services to the breaking point.

Israel's way of life has been altered drastically.

That's why this year's UJA Federation Walk with Israel is absolutely essential, as part of Israel Emergency Campaign 2003.

We need to show our support for Israel by taking to the streets of Toronto. For us it's easy. Unfortunately for Israelis, a simple stroll has become a dangerous situation.

The long-term damage to Israel, her economy and her social structure will take years to repair. But we can start now, and your participation in this year's Walk with Israel is an important first step!

So, on Victoria Day, Monday, May 20th, let's tell the people of Israel, "We're with you!"

Canada abstains in UN vote

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Canada last week abstained on a United Nations resolution that condemned Israel only hours after a Palestinian suicide bomber killed 15 Israelis and wounded dozens at a recreational hall in a Tel Aviv suburb.

The 189-member General Assembly, meeting in its "10th Emergency Special Session" on the Middle East, condemned Israel's recent military operations in the West Bank and its rejection of a UN fact-finding mission to the Jenin refugee camp.

Resolution focuses on IDF at Jenin

The Arab-sponsored resolution passed by a vote of 74 to four, with 54 countries abstaining. The voting took place soon after the bombing attack at the billiards hall and casino in Rishon Lezion.

Voting against the measure were Israel, the United States, Micronesia and the Marshall Islands.

Israel's ambassador to the UN, Yehuda Lancry, said the resolution "would be an offence to the memory of Israeli victims of Palestinian terrorism."

Arab states rejected a proposal to include a condemnation of Palestinian terror attacks against Israel.

'I want to show support for Israel'

By EDGAR ASHER
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — For a group of three young Canadian volunteers, painting a large carton with red and white identification panels at an Israeli army base last week was more than just manual labour.

Youths volunteer at army base

"I had been sitting at home watching the news and not really been able to deal with what's been going on," said Ilana Halperin as she set aside a paint brush loaded with bright red paint.

"I wanted to come to Israel myself and speak to people and get the real story and give my assistance, because even though I live in Canada, I still consider Israel to be my country and I want to give it my assistance during these hard times."

The three Canadians – Halperin, Aliza Shupac, both from Toronto, and Anna Kahane from Calgary – were painting the cartons, intended to hold emergency supplies, at the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) base near Tel Aviv as part of a delegation of 65 young people visiting Israel for a week to show support for the country's soldiers and needy communities.

The mission arrived in Israel with more than 2,000 kg of supplies for Israel's needy and soldiers. Apart from basic supplies, there were children's games, candies, food staples and clothing. The goods will be put into gift boxes together with letters written by Canadian school children to the recipients.

The mission was organized and the supplies were collected by the Canada Israel Experience, UIA Federations Canada and Birthright Israel.

This is the third major mission to Israel from Canada in the past month to support Israel in its time of need. In addition to volunteering, the delegation also heard speakers from the Foreign Ministry and the IDF on the present security situation.

The News in Brief

CANADA

UJA Shabbat

TORONTO — Rabbis across the religious spectrum in the greater Toronto area will be speaking to their congregations this Shabbat (May 18) on the importance of the UJA's Israel Emergency Campaign 2003. The day has been designated UJA Shabbat and will coincide with Shavuot.

Plaut, Kayfetz Kudos

TORONTO — Two of Canada's premier Jewish thinkers will be honoured at a prestigious academic conference, the Congress of Social Sciences and Humanities, to take place here later this month. Rabbi Gunther Plaut and the late Ben Kayfetz will be honoured at the annual meeting of the Association for Canadian Jewish Studies (ACJS), which takes place during the congress. Rabbi Plaut, who will deliver the keynote address, will receive the ACJS Award for his lifetime contribution to Canadian Jewish studies. The evening will also pay tribute to Kayfetz as one of the foremost historians of Canadian Jewry. As well, the program will feature a panel of scholars who will review Prof. Morton Weinfeld's recently-published book, Like Everyone Else But Different: The Paradoxical Success of Canadian Jewry. The event takes place May 26 at Beth Tzedec Synagogue.

Awards for Feld Carr

TORONTO — Judy Feld Carr, whose efforts over 25 years resulted in the rescue of more than 3,000 Syrian Jews, will receive an honorary doctor of humane letters degree on May 23 at the convocation ceremony at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York. Carr will also receive this year's Abram L. Sachar Medal at Brandeis University in Boston on May 31.

ISRAEL

Extremists Banned

JERUSALEM — A Knesset committee has approved a bill that would empower the Central Election Committee to ban any party or individual from running for parliament if they express support for the armed struggle of an enemy country or terrorist organization, engage in racist incitement or deny the existence of Israel as a Jewish and democratic state.

Hotel Discounts

JERUSALEM — Dozens of Israeli hotels are offering steep discounts to reserve soldiers and their families. The Israel Hotel Association announced that reservists who can show they served at least 10 days in the West Bank and Gaza Strip can get a 50 per cent discount through July.

WORLD

Jewish Festival

ROME — Twenty-one countries plan to take part in the third annual European Day of Jewish Culture on June 16. Hundreds of Jewish heritage sites in participating countries will be opened to the public, and special programs, performances and exhibitions are planned. Last year's event drew some 170,000 visitors. This year's theme is "The Jewish Calendar and Festivals through Art, Music, Cooking and Other Encounters." Details can be found at www.jewisheritage.org.

Czech Exhibit

WARSAW — An exhibit is opening at the Auschwitz-Birkenau Museum commemorating the tens of thousands of former Czechs who perished at the death camp. Leading Czech officials joined Jewish representatives at last week's opening of the permanent exhibit. Senior Slovak figures plan to attend a separate exhibition, "The Tragedy of Slovak Jews."

N.Y. Times Boycott

NEW YORK — Two campaigns have been launched to protest what is seen as a pro-Palestinian bias in The New York Times' Middle East coverage. Both campaigns call on readers to cancel their subscriptions for at least one month in protest. The paper denies any charges of bias.

New Memorial

NEW YORK — Poland and the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum plan to work together to create a memorial at a former Nazi death camp. Groundbreaking for the new memorial is expected to take place next month at the Belzec death camp in Poland.

Pro-Israel Insert

RIO DE JANEIRO — Some 150,000 subscribers to a Brazilian newspaper recently received a pro-Israel insert. The May 3 insert in O Globo, one of Brazil's largest papers, was a joint initiative of the Jewish Museum here and private donors. About 35,000 Jewish homes already received the insert in Jewish papers published in Rio and Sao Paulo.

Fund Ends

ZURICH — A Swiss fund set up to help needy Holocaust survivors has wrapped up its work. Created five years ago, the fund paid out some $180 million (US) to nearly 310,000 people around the world. It was established after Swiss banks were accused of looting dormant Holocaust-era accounts. In Canada, $3.7 million (Cdn) was distributed to 7,091 survivors with immediate financial needs, for an average payout of $521.

Move to Expel Israel Thwarted

NEW YORK — In what's being seen as a victory for pro-Israel groups, a resolution to expel the Israel Medical Association from the World Medical Association (WMA) was thwarted last week.

The expected resolution, which blamed Israeli doctors for not opposing Israel's recent military operation, was initiated by Denmark and expected to be introduced by one of the Scandinavian member countries of the 14-nation executive body of the association at its annual meeting in Geneva.

The WMA, a nongovernmental organization that works closely with the United Nations but operates as an independent consortium of national medical associations, had denied knowledge of any motion to expel the Israel Medical Association.

On its Web site, it called the subject a "hoax" that elicited 20,000 e-mails.

Instead, there was a "proposed resolution on the assurance of medical and health services during the armed conflict between Israelis and Palestinians," the WMA said.

Israel confident but bleeding, says Israeli envoy

Alon Pinkas addresses UJA Federation campaign launch

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Contrary to many critics, diplomat and frequent television commentator Alon Pinkas believes that, overall, media reports on the situation in the Middle East are balanced.

But Israel's consul general in New York, who was here last week as keynote speaker for the launch of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Israel Emergency Campaign 2003, said in an interview before the event that he is not always happy with what he calls the media's "Polaroid shot" of a powerful, rich Israel versus weak, victimized Palestinians.

Alon Pinkas

"As a Polaroid shot it's probably correct, but that doesn't reflect the history."

Nor does he attribute negativity toward Israel to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's image. When Sharon's more moderate predecessor, Ehud Barak, was in office, there were similar problems, Pinkas said.

The media's need for instant gratification and impatience with historical context sometimes frustrates him, but "if you're insistent and persistent, they'll let you get your point across.'

As an Israeli, Pinkas said, he has less of the "complex attitude toward being Jewish" than North Americans do. "We don't have this urge to constantly apologize or explain... maybe we should."

His comment reflects a common criticism leveled at Israel's handling of public relations, some of which, he noted, is now being handled in New York by a prestigious public relations firm.

For Pinkas as an Israeli, being able to look in the mirror and being accountable to his own conscience matter more than wondering about the opinion of non-Jewish neighbours, he explained.

The fact that North Americans have heard about allegations of looting by Israeli soldiers, and the fact that a lieutenant colonel was court martialed, attests to the openness of Israeli society, he said.

Pinkas doesn't believe anti-Israel attitudes are as prevalent in the United States as some people think. "I think that if you look at American public opinion polls, you will see increasingly high numbers of people who support Israel and denounce the Palestinians for their use of violence."

In his speech at the launch, Pinkas, a third-generation Israeli, lauded the crowd of more than 1,000 people at the Fairmont Royal York Hotel for their support of Israel.

The campaign began four months ahead of schedule in response to the current crisis in Israel, and has raised $31.5 million in its first 26 days, campaign co-chair Howard Sokolowski announced.

Pinkas urged people to remember that, as bad as things seem, Israel also has a symphony orchestra, universities, rabbis with advanced theological learning and a thriving high tech industry.

Into the Negev

David Ben-Gurion, one of Israel's founding parents and its first prime minister, dreamt of, spoke of and actually tried reclaiming the Negev Desert.

In this space last week, I wrote about Ben-Gurion's personal attachment to the Negev and his decision to live out his days in the remote desert kibbutz, Sdeh Boker.

During my recent visit to Israel, as I wrote last week, I was able to visit Sdeh Boker and from there, see and feel the vastness of the desert.

From the editor's desk

The descent is a relatively short one from the stepped, green and gold, pine-forested hills surrounding Jerusalem southward to the flat beige approaches whose horizon yields the modern skyline of Beersheva in the northern Negev, the region's largest city.

Mere moments from Beersheva's city limits, however, the desert unfolds in all its sculpted, wind-swept, haunting beauty. Travelling a short distance southwest, we stop at Ein Avdat National Park. This is no park of trees, shrubs, grass and flower beds. Rather, it is an imposing desert canyon, a dry wadi bed between two steep, statuesque walls of wind-carved stone and sand.

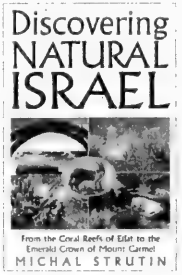
The park is not far away from the archeological ruins of Avdat, one of the key stops along the ancient Spice Route tying Asia to Europe and to Africa.

Avdat was built by the Nabateans, a remarkable people renowned for their ability to husband the precious, scarce sources of water in the desert from which they sustained a sophisticated, agrarian way of life.

We left our car at the entrance of the park and walked along a sandy, chalky trail along the edge of a waterbed, a small stream coursing through the wadi. On the other side of the stream, metres away, were two ibex, unbothered by the humans intruding upon their wilderness space, feeding on the dust-covered shrubs that seemed to grow out of the very face of the rock canyon.

After 10 minutes, we arrived at the end of the trail, a waterfall that drops from some 20 metres above at the roof of the canyon, into a pool carved by nature at the base of the canyon wall. Apart from the sounds of our own shoes scraping the stones beneath our feet, we could hear only the downward stream of the waterfall splashing into the pool, the cooing of overhead desert doves and the wind breezing through the smooth, rocky gorge. There we rested, like tiny pebbles in the cupped palm of one's hand, at the edge of the pool, in the shaded protection of the steep ivory-coloured walls of the canyon.

After Ein Avdat we travelled due south some 30 kilometres to Machtesh Ramon, a breathtaking, unique, crater-like, geological formation, dubbed by many as Israel's Grand Canyon. The town of Mitspeh Ramon rings the northern edge of the machtesh and is an accommodating, friendly base from which to explore the geological treasures of the machtesh.



One of those treasures is a sandstone hill near the main trail in the machtesh, known as the nagariah, the carpentry shop. At the top of the hill are countless thousands of sharp-angled, rectangular prism formations of sandstone carved by sun and water. The rocks are so symmetrical and uniformly shaped, it is as if they were all manufactured in a carpentry shop. Hence the name.

The noise, pace, clogged-up roads and relentless clatter of the cities are only a memory in the sheer, total stillness of the "gaping grandeur" of the machtesh.

So uncommonly beautiful, so absolutely quiet, the desert exudes a contemplative power that is tangibly therapeutic and surprisingly comforting.

For anyone wishing to read about the many inspiring natural treasures of tiny Israel, one of the finest new books on the majesty of Israel's geography is Discovering Natural Israel by Michal Strutin, published last year by Jonathan David Publishers, New York.

Her sections on Ein Avdat and Machtesh Ramon are superb.

Strutin is an experienced, award-winning author whose easy, deft, accessible style of writing combines geography, history, Bible and legend in her descriptions of the nature lovers' hikes, two of which I was fortunate to take last month in the Negev.

Nearly 40 years ago in Sdeh Boker, Ben-Gurion wrote: "When I look out of my window today and see a tree standing there, that tree gives me a greater sense of beauty and personal delight than all the vast forests I have seen in Switzerland or Scandinavia. Because every tree here was planted by us. It was nursed to life by the water we brought to it at such cost and effort. Why does a mother love her children? Because they are of her creation. Why does the Jew have affinity for Israel? Because here again everything remains to be accomplished. It is his privilege and his place to share in this creative act. The trees at Sdeh Boker speak to me in a special way, in another language than any other trees anywhere. Not only because I helped to grow them, but because they constitute a gift of man to nature and a gift of the Jews to the cradle of their culture."

If ever the opportunity arises, I suggest you visit the Negev, to see and to feel the splendour that so stirred Ben-Gurion.

Herut leader says Israel should retake West Bank, Gaza

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel should re-occupy the West Bank and the Gaza Strip to ensure its security, says Israeli parliamentarian Michael Kleiner.

"I'm not talking about an agreed solution," said Kleiner, whose Herut party is identified with Israel's far right. "This is impossible. We have to impose this solution."

Kleiner, a member of the Knesset's security and foreign affairs committee, broke away from the Likud party after the 1998 Wye agreement, condemning its leader at the time, former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu, for betraying Likud's Greater Israel principles.

Today, Kleiner sits in parliament as a one-man faction of the Herut party, also known as The National Jewish Movement.

Claiming the Palestinian problem can only be resolved if Israel seizes full control of the West Bank and Gaza, Kleiner said Israel should declare sovereignty over them.

The Palestinians should be allowed to administer their own affairs, provided they do not engage in anti-Israel incitement, he said.

Kleiner, who spoke to The CJN during a recent trip to Toronto, believes that if Israel retakes the West Bank and Gaza, it will be able to put a virtual stop to Palestinian suicide bombers.

In his view, Israel should arrest Yasser Arafat, the Chairman of the Palestinian Authority, and place him on trial as a war criminal, "like Adolf Eichmann."

And, he added, Arafat's associates should be exiled.

"We need a new Palestinian leadership," Kleiner.

Calling his ideas realistic, Kleiner said the United States would accept reoccupation as a fait accompli if it is done quickly.

Bi-partisan support for letting Israel keep the West Bank and Gaza is strong in the U.S. Congress, said Kleiner, who was here to address the Toronto Zionist Council.

He characterized Operation Defensive Shield, which Israel officially wound up last month, as a short-term panacea.

He voiced regret that the massive incursion into the West Bank had increased Arafat's popularity.

Michael Kleiner

Belittling Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's proposal to establish a buffer zone between Israel and the West Bank, Kleiner said it would not enhance Israel's security and would therefore be a waste of money.

Nor should Israel declare unilateral separation by withdrawing from portions of the West Bank and Gaza, he warned.

"It's a dangerous illusion, and will solve nothing. It will be like France's Maginot Line [in World War II] – an illusion."

Blasting Sharon for having come out in favour of a Palestinian state, Kleiner said the move backfired because it encouraged U.S. President George W. Bush to express official support for Palestinian statehood.

"If there will be a Palestinian state, there will be no Israel, sooner or later," he claimed.

A Palestinian state, however small, discontiguous and de-militarized, would be hostile to Israel, would expand its borders and would gain control of its air space, Kleiner said.

Such a state, he predicted, would eventually absorb Israel.

Israel would cease to exist as a sovereign, independent country, and Jews would be a minority in a greater Palestinian state.

"We can't take another risk by giving the Palestinians a state," he said.

Arafat, Kleiner said, breached the Oslo accords by resorting to violence, and he would do it again.

Kleiner disclosed he may yet reintroduce a bill, defeated recently, to annul the Knesset's 1993 approval of the Oslo process.

He accused Netanyahu, the premier from 1996 to 1999, of betraying Likud principles – first by relinquishing much of Hebron and, secondly, at the Wye summit, by agreeing to give up 13 per cent of the West Bank.

"He gave away land for nothing," said Kleiner, adding that Sharon is better able to withstand external pressures than Netanyahu.

Turning to a different topic, Kleiner charged that most Israeli Arabs are disloyal to Israel and suggested they are a fifth column.

Disloyal citizens should not be permitted to hold Israeli citizenship, nor should they participate in Israel's political life.

Loyal Israeli Arabs, on the other hand, should be given all rights of equal citizenship.

Kleiner, a lawyer, said the recent decision by an Israeli Knesset committee to strip Arab MK Azmi Bishara of his parliamentary immunity was, in fact, illegal because the anti-Israel speeches he is alleged to have made were delivered within a political context.

Bishara was charged with sedition after praising Hezbollah, which fought Israel in southern Lebanon. He is now on trial in Nazareth.

Kleiner, who believes Bishara is guilty of treason, said Israel would be better served if it bans his Balad party.

Nevertheless, if Bishara is found guilty, he should be put in front of a firing squad and shot, Kleiner said.

He said Bishara is not the sole Arab MK to have shown disloyalty toward Israel. He pointed out that Arab members of the Knesset reflect the views of their constituents.

"A big majority of Israeli Arabs support their MKs, and I'm not ready to help Israeli Arabs who are against Israel."

Before entering politics, he was director-general of the Jewish Agency's Department for Education in the Diaspora and chairman of the Amidar National Housing Company.

Conservative sisterhoods take on advocacy role

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Strength in Unity – the theme of a recent Women's League for Conservative Judaism conference – refers to unity both within and beyond the organization, which is the umbrella for more than 700 Conservative and Masorti women's groups.

At the two-day conference, held recently at Adath Israel Congregation for members of the League's Canadian Seaway branch, delegates from sisterhoods of Conservative synagogues in Ontario were encouraged to pursue Jewish study personally, to strengthen their own sisterhoods and to advocate for Israel.

Speaker David Goldberg, director of research and education for the Canada-Israel Committee, proposed a "call to action" to the group of about 80 women, encouraging them to help Israel fight its "PR battle."

Karen Mock, executive director of the Canadian Race Relations Foundation, also encouraged advocacy, a message Lynne Lurie, a co-chair of the conference, said she would take back to her congregation, Shaar Shalom.

Part of the Women's League mandate is to reinforce bonds with Israel. "We must talk with our friends, our neighbours and even more importantly, with our governments," said Cory Schneider, Pennsylvania-based consultant for Canadian Seaway and chair of strategic planning for Women's League for Conservative Judaism.

Schneider also encouraged delegates to pledge to study Torah. "As you educate yourselves, the future of Judaism will be secure," she said.

The Torah study initiative is part of a project involving the writing of a Torah that will be housed in the Women's League Synagogue at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York. The Torah will be dedicated at the Women's League international conference in Philadelphia in November.

The goal of Women's League, which also offers extensive leadership training, is to "perpetuate traditional Judaism," Schneider told The CJN. "We're hoping to make women aware of how much they can benefit from their involvement, both as Jews and as leaders."

"One of our missions is to promote and develop future leaders," said Bertha Gold, who succeeded Rivy Blass as Canadian Seaway president at the conference.

"A lot of our younger women want to go on to serve their synagogue," said Gold. "We're trying to keep them [in Women's League] in some small way."

> 'As you educate yourselves, the future of Judaism will be secure'

Although Jewish women today don't need organizations like Women's League to give them access to power or a full social life, there is still a need to bond with other women with whom one has things in common, said Schneider in her keynote address. Today's generation of women is also "thirsty for a richer, deeper engagement with Jewish tradition," which the organization can provide, she added.

Within individual sisterhoods and in the umbrella organization, attracting younger members (under 45) is an issue being addressed by an initiative called Z'hava. There is also an online discussion group for women in their 20s who want to connect with other Conservative Jewish women but are not ready to join a sisterhood.

The purpose of Z'hava is to "help build sisterhood membership of younger Jewish women in our community, and to bring them into leadership positions," said Rochelle Grossman, Z'hava chair for Canadian Seaway branch.

Edda Laxer, 49, incoming president of Beth Tikvah Congregation's sisterhood, was one of the younger women at the conference, although she is not the youngest in her sisterhood. She agrees that attracting new members and getting new ideas are important, but added that one of the best things about her involvement is that she's formed close friendships with people her mother's age.

The stereotype of sisterhood being for older women is changing, Gold believes. "I don't think sisterhood is what it was 25 years ago." The educational and leadership resources available from the umbrella organization are "phenomenal," she said.

"Welcome every one of the women in your congregation," Schneider said in a closing speech. "Find out what their buttons are, their needs and interests."

It's harder for all organizations to get people involved, said Donna Kleiman, a conference co-chair and member of Congregation Or Shalom in London.

In her community, access to speakers and resources is also more difficult than it is in Toronto, she said.

But despite that challenge and the relatively small size of her congregation (300 families), her sisterhood is in a "good, healthy condition."

Kleiman, who was one of seven Londoners at the conference, returned home enthusiastic about the networking at the conference, the possibility of Mock speaking at her congregation and the Z'hava initiative.

"You can always improve your camaraderie or welcoming of new people. Sometimes you get into a little bit of a rut."

POSTWORD

Only a person whose moral compass has been overwhelmed by political bigotry would speak of civilians killed deliberately and civilians killed accidentally by commandos fighting terrorism as if their killer were equally evil. But the obvious difference is overlooked, deliberately it seems, by the pundits and political leaders who are now demanding that Israel withdraw from Ramallah, the rest of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.....If the world desires peace in the Middle East, it should stand foursquare behind Israel and guarantee that Palestinian violence will not be rewarded. A week of puzzling Canadian policy

As of this writing, the final destinations of the 13 Palestinian thugs whom Israel wanted to arrest have not yet been determined. They walked out of the Church of the Nativity last week along with the rest of the hoodlum gang that overran the Christian holy site more than four weeks ago. The deal granting their release effectively marked the end of Operation Defensive Shield launched by the Israel Defence Forces against the Palestinian terrorist infrastructure after the Passover slaughters.

These suspected murderers and murderers' accomplices will find sanctuary in Europe. For a while, however, it seemed – incredibly so – that some were headed to Canada.

At a press conference last week in Madrid, Prime Minister Jean Chrétien strongly implied that Canada would receive some or all of them because, as he explained, "Canada is always willing to be helpful in that very tragic situation in the Middle East."

"Being helpful," especially in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, is a laudable objective. But providing a home in our midst for men known to be terrorists cannot possibly fall within the meaning of "being helpful." Indeed, it would be a setback. Moreover, and perhaps most important of all, it would be a betrayal of the rights and freedoms embedded in the democratic core of our own way of life.

Keith Landy, the national president of the Canadian Jewish Congress, last week summed up the feelings of disbelief and disapproval shared by most Canadians at the prime minister's apparent offer of safe haven for the suspected terrorists. "Canada is fighting a war on terror. Canada has declared Hamas a terrorist organization. It is totally inconsistent with this country's policy to turn around and accept these violent and dangerous men on our shores. These individuals are unrepentant and their presence in our country poses a threat to all Canadians."

It leads us to point out therefore, that Canada's offer of sanctuary as a way of "being helpful," was very puzzling, at the least.

Also puzzling was the abstention last week by Canada at the United Nations General Assembly on a vote that condemned Israel's actions in the West Bank. The positive sentiments toward Israel expressed by the Canadian government prior to the vote were no consolation to us and certainly of no lasting significance for the history of the occasion. Those sentiments will not prevent the record from becoming fatter with the lies, distortions and mistruths about Israel that in the Third World are now standard reading, all of which form the backdrop to their governments' anti-Israel policies in the Middle East.

It is undoubtedly true that Canada assists Israel in myriad important ways "behind the scenes." Indeed, Israeli spokespeople have often publicly attested to the fact. But an abstention on an unfair, anti-Israel vote relating to the violence of the conflict, held mere moments after the Rishon Lezion massacre, in which 15 Israelis were killed, is puzzling and disappointing to Canadians. It is also a great shame.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO...

Deafening message for Israel

Imagine the response if 800 Montrealers had been savagely assassinated and thousands injured over the last 18 months – ordinary citizens going about their daily lives in restaurants, in churches and at family celebrations, blown apart limb by limb? Proportionately, that is what has taken place in Israel over the past year and a half.

Chances are our reaction would be comparable to that of the Israeli government. We would expect our government to take whatever proportionate action was necessary to protect our friends and neighbours from terrorism. We would not be satisfied with temporary security but would seek permanent safety.

Yet, why is it that we don't afford Israel the same right? Why does it seem the world community has placed a lower value on the lives of Israelis than they have on terrorists? I'm not a Jew and I'm left wing, but I recognize an insidious double standard when it hits me in the face.

Sadly, in their hour of need, Israelis are receiving a deafening international message that their lives are expendable. If the world needs a sitting duck and your last name happens to end in -stein or -berg, step on down.

It would be easier to show greater respect for the Palestinian cause if its leaders showed the wisdom of Mahatma Ghandi or Martin Luther King, and its supporters were as prepared to place human shields around pizzerias in Haifa as they are around Yasser Arafat in Palestine. Instead they opt for turnstiles for terrorists.

If we allow suicide bombers to win in the Middle East, we will allow them to succeed on Wall Street or at synagogues in Saskatoon.

Israel's price to give peace a chance was twofold:

First, Yasser Arafat had to renounce terrorism in Arabic and ensure seven days of calm. Surely, for the millions of Palestinian refugees that is a price worth paying.

Second, for those who value human life, standing shoulder to shoulder with Israel against terrorism will always be a price worth paying.

In praise of Srul Glick

As a proud Jew and Canadian, and a lover of classical music, I was deeply saddened by the passing of Srul Irving Glick. Canada has lost a true national treasure. In my opinion, Glick was the quintessential composer of Jewish music – he spoke to my Jewish soul and his melodies touched me more deeply than virtually any other composer's works ever have or ever could. Despite visiting Toronto on countless occasions over the years, I was only fortunate enough once – just within the past few years — to meet him briefly and watch him conduct the Beth Tikvah choir in a festival service. What beautiful music it was to my ears and soul!

As much as I can't help but be profoundly saddened at his passing and the realization of how much more he could have enhanced my life if he had lived to create additional wonderful compositions, I am nevertheless comforted by my appreciation for what he did compose, and I will always treasure the many CDs of his music that I possess, in particular one performed by the talented Canadian saxophonist Paul Brodie. May Mr. Glick's memory be for a blessing for all peace-loving Canadians and peace-loving peoples around the globe.

Buy Israeli products

At a time when Israel is increasingly being singled out for ostracism and penalization, the Jews of the Diaspora have to demonstrate their support in as many ways as possible.

There are rallies to attend, charities to support, and for those who can visit, our homeland awaits. However, with all the goodwill in the world, rallies do not put bread on the table of our brothers and sisters in Israel.

There is another means of support where we receive a tangible return for our money. We must purchase the products that are made in Israel whenever and wherever possible. The supermarket shelves are replete with various groceries imported from Israel, and even if they cost a few cents more, together we can send money to the people who need it most – the everyday person who has to provide food and shelter for his or her family.

Without our support of this kind, Israelis in manufacturing, agriculture, transportation in all its forms and the various service industries that support them – banking, insurance, accounting, etc. – will suffer at our hands by virtue of our collective apathy.

Cowards are contemptible

It is often said that the worth and value of a society is measured by how it treats its most vulnerable members. Those sneaking cowards who, under cover of darkness, recently spray-painted graffiti at the Reena Battle Centre, frightening the developmentally disabled people Reena serves, are as contemptible as those they support, who advocate and foster suicide killings of innocent men, woman and children. They lack the courage to stand up and speak out in support of their point of view, but prefer to crawl out from under a rock and slither back again before they can be discovered.

Hypocrisy and double standards

By MICHAEL POSNER

Suppose for a moment that a group of 200 Israeli soldiers took refuge from a company of Palestinian fighters in an ancient house of worship. A church, perhaps – otherwise occupied, let's say, by a few dozen Roman Catholic monks, friars and nuns. In other words, a simple reversal of the situation, occurring as I write, at the Church of the Nativity in Bethlehem. Would it be 30 minutes – or 30 seconds – before the Palestinians torched the entire building?

Michael Posner

Or suppose instead that the same Israeli soldiers took refuge in a hospital crowded with the sick and the elderly, much as a group of Palestinians did in Hebron last month. In that event, how long would it be before the righteous editorialists and instant pundits unleashed their venom at the Israelis? How long before envoys of the sanctimonious and duplicitous aid and relief organizations, the Red Cross, Human Rights Watch and all the others – not to mention the United Nations – began a bombardment of e-mails, press releases and sound bites accusing Israeli soldiers of using innocent civilians as human shields and other heinous violations of internationally recognized standards of warfare?

Of course, the gun is on the other shoulder, as it were. It is not Israelis but Palestinians who hold hostages in one of Christianity's holiest places. It is not Israelis but Palestinians who have taken their guns into geriatric and maternity wards. But about this the anguished columnists and "even-handed" editorial writers – not to mention the Christian clergy – are utterly silent. About this the human rights activists do not feel compelled to speak. They are busy people, after all, busy scurrying through Jenin trying to dredge up manufactured evidence of a massacre that never occurred.

The hypocrisy of it all is staggering. Last month, when it must have become clear even to virulent anti-Semites that nothing remotely like a massacre occurred in Jenin, that the original Israeli body count was largely accurate and that everything the Israeli government had initially asserted was in fact the case, the entire circus of Jenin had descended to the level of a Jackie Mason monologue.

"Well, it wasn't a massacre exactly, but it was like a massacre. Or maybe it wasn't a massacre, but it was certainly an atrocity. Okay, so it wasn't precisely an atrocity, but it was absolutely, definitely, undeniably, a disproportionate use of force. Disproportionate to what? Who knows? So maybe it wasn't disproportionate, maybe it was roughly proportionate, but I can tell you for sure it was illegal, unlawful, and illicit – they should not have done it. And they destroyed thousands of homes. Alright, it wasn't thousands of homes, it was dozens of homes, it was several homes, maybe a few homes, one or two homes – a tent, for sure. And how do I know all this? The Palestinians told me, so it must be true."

Late last month, still seeking to create a massacre that never happened, officials from the United National Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA) and other erstwhile humanitarian agencies were trying to pump up the body count by identifying missing people. They came up with a grand total of 22, most of them presumably in hiding. In one story, a UN expert said it would take two months to remove all the explosives and make Jenin safe for reconstruction. The story neglected to point out who planted the explosives.

Of course, if Israel had planted thousands of mines and booby traps in a heavily populated civilian neighbourhood, there would have been an emergency debate of the UN Security Council – soon to be chaired by Syria, of all nations – to condemn this gross violation of humanitarian principles, and various European statesmen – models of integrity, every one – would doubtless have shaken their heads (more in sorrow than anger, you understand) at what had happened to the once-laudable Israeli sense of morality.

All this might actually be funny if it weren't so tragic. Tragic because our moral universe is experiencing a dangerous pole reversal, in which the Palestinian leadership – a corrupt and venal gang of murderous thugs – and the people they purport to represent have somehow been transformed into desperate victims, while Israelis who attempt to defend themselves from these same killers are routinely depicted as racist and Nazi aggressors.

There are, of course, two fronts in the current war.

The critical one, on the ground, involves Israel's long-overdue response to the wave of Palestinian suicide bombings, a campaign of indiscriminate terror against civilian targets that would not be tolerated for a second by any other government in the world.

Even if you support the maximum territorial demands of the Palestinians, even if you inhabit the delusional realms of martyrdom preached by Hamas and Islamic Jihad, what is the appreciable difference – beyond the raw number of casualties – between a psychotic who crashes a hijacked airplane into the World Trade Center and one who detonates explosives packed with spikes and nails in a room filled with elderly Passover celebrants? Let us at least refer to both acts by their proper name: homicide – and on an epic scale.

The war's second front is in the media, where the battle for public opinion is being fiercely waged. In effect, that means western public opinion, because the state-controlled media in most Arab, and many Third World, countries are used principally to demonize the Jewish State through systematic, unrelenting propaganda.

In a recent piece, The Nation columnist Eric Alterman compiled a scorecard purporting to show that an overwhelming majority of U.S. pundits in print are pro-Israel. But his scorecard conveniently ignored dozens of Israel-based TV and print journalists, as well as the editorial boards of major newspapers. The copy and footage of both groups tends to lean no less decisively in favour of the Palestinians, and arguably has more influence on readers and viewers.

The tragic irony here is that the same reporters and editors who led the flag-waving campaign for U.S. President George Bush's war on terrorism are somehow unable to connect the dots to Ramallah and Jenin – to recognize that the goals of Yasser Arafat's Al Aqsa Brigades and Osama bin Laden's Al Qaeda terrorists are one and the same.

By MICHAEL BROWN

It's open season on Jews, again! At least that's the way many Jews (and not a few non-Jews) are feeling these days. Some will put the perception down to Jewish touchiness, others to Jews' unwillingness to bear criticism, especially of Israel. But is it more than that? And how do we know whether statements are anti-Semitic or not? Svend Robinson's pronouncements, for instance, or those of church leaders, academics, UN officials, and media panjandrums denouncing Israel's recent military actions?

Michael Brown

Everyone agrees that burning or bombing a synagogue (such as in Djerba, Marseilles and elsewhere, not to mention suspicious fires in Toronto and Saskatoon, all in recent weeks), defiling a Jewish cemetery (as has occurred many places in Europe recently), or writing obscene graffiti on buildings and washrooms ("Kill Jews," "Israelis=Nazis," seen now in many public places in Toronto) is an anti-Semitic act. But is criticism of Israel anti-Semitic?

Robinson and those other guardians of Israel's morality have never, I am sure, torched a Jewish building nor written an obscene graffito. But what about their positions in recent months and weeks?

As someone who has researched and published a fair bit about anti-Semitism here in Canada and elsewhere, I have developed what I consider to be the foolproof litmus test of anti-Semitism. It is this: Having one standard for Jews and a different one for the rest of the world.

Since this is exam time at university, here are a few questions from my test.

Who could be so hard of heart as not to feel deeply the suffering of the Palestinians? I feel it, and so do most of my friends and family.

But the passion and vehemence of the critics are hard to understand when compared to the relative apathy regarding Chechens, Kurds, Tibetans, Pashtuns, Rwandans, Afghani and Saudi women, and the Zimbabwe opposition, to say nothing of Muslims and Hindus slaughtering each other on the Indian sub-continent in great numbers. Those groups, too, are confronted by hostile states or state-sponsored movements. But they excite little righteous indignation in the West.

Who could not agree with the politicians, clergy, and community leaders who urged us not to scapegoat Muslims or Arabs after Sept.11?

But where are those same leaders today? Where are the voices urging people (including Muslims) not to scapegoat all Jews because they are angry at Israel? And where were they in Durban, that UN-sponsored, anti-Semitic hatefest?

Who would not agree that children should not be killed by soldiers in the West Bank or Gaza or anywhere else?

But why do those same guardians of children's welfare not care about the murder of Israeli children in indiscriminate bombings of buses and restaurants? And why are those voices not denouncing the teaching of hate in Palestinian schools, which results in children taunting armed soldiers?

Who would not agree that losing one's home and becoming a refugee is a human catastrophe?

But how is it that those who insist on the Palestinians' right of return do not care about the more than 750,000 Jews who have fled Arab lands since 1945 and have mostly been resettled in Israel? And how is it that they do not claim the right of return for the millions of Muslims and Hindus in India, Pakistan, and Bangladesh displaced since 1947? Or the Turks and Greeks in Cyprus since the Turkish invasion? Or the Germans chased out of Poland and the Poles chased out of Russia after World War II?

Who would not agree that war is evil, that destruction and the suffering of the innocent are inevitable "collateral damage?"

But why is it that only one country in the world has no right to defend itself, no right to exist, according to some?

So how do the critics of Israel score on my anti-Semitism test?

Most of them fail.

Robinson says Israel is a "terrorist state," but that we must understand the motivations of Palestinian bombers. Naomi Klein – you don't have to be gentile to be a party to anti-Semitism – writes in the Globe and Mail about "Sharon-style brutality" but sees Palestinian suicide murderers as merely "resisting an occupying force." The Nobel committee wants to revoke the Peace Prize awarded to Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, one of the foremost Israeli advocates of concessions and compromise, but not that of Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat.

The media and the politicians urge immediate Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank, but not immediate American (and Canadian) withdrawal from Afghanistan. Church people want the sanctity of the Church of the Nativity respected, but say nothing about the destruction of Jewish holy sites by Muslims or the murder of Jews at a Passover seder.

We hear a lot now about the power of "the Jewish lobby" or "the Israeli lobby," as if there were no Arab lobby or oil lobby. To those who know their history, the term "Jewish lobby" sounds like an updated version of that old libel invented by the czarist secret police: the fantasy of an international Jewish conspiracy.

And the new term is being used as the old one was: to cover up the real conspiracy. The old term was meant to deflect attention from czarist oppression, and later, from fascism and Nazism. The new term is meant to hide old fashioned prejudice and often serves as a smokescreen for Al Qaeda and its allies.

The conclusion is inevitable, and it saddens those of us who hoped that the blood of six million Jews crying out from the soil of Europe had opened the eyes of the world to the evils of anti-Semitism and other forms of blind hatred.

But Jews' lives are again worth less than those of others. The Jewish people are not yet accorded the same rights and respect as other nations. And that's why it's hard to believe Svend Robinson and others like him when they proclaim themselves free of anti-Semitism.

No one has a right to expect Jews in Israe or Canada or anywhere else to live up to ideals to which others are not held. Let Jews be judged by the same standards and abide by the same rules as other peoples, other religions, other nations. Anything else is anti-Semitism, no matter how it's couched, even if you don't scrawl graffiti on public buildings.

Suicide bombings?

As I write these lines, the topic of suicide bombings is still uppermost in many people's minds.

More than once in social conversation, I have heard comments about the "idealism" that people are said to exhibit when they are willing to sacrifice their lives in order to achieve what appears to them to be a larger purpose.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

But the term "suicide bombing" means more than sacrificing one's own life. It describes people who strap explosives to their bodies and then set them off among people they intend to kill, and, of course, they lose their own lives in the process.

In other words, the term "suicide bombing" is putting the emphasis on the wrong party. The objective is not to commit suicide, but to kill others, and dying in that attempt is an aspect of the execution, but not its ultimate goal. The primary objective, to repeat, is to kill others, and suffering death in the process may be an inevitable part of the plan.

Since that is the case, the emphasis on suicide in the term "suicide bombing" is clearly mistaken.

That being the case, I have pleaded before – and so far without any success – that the term "suicide bombing" reeks of idealism rather than of murderous intent. I therefore suggest that we should abandon this terminology, because it makes admirable idealists out of killers. Instead, we should call such acts "homicide bombings."

To me, suicide bombers are terrorists plain and simple. They commit deliberate and indiscriminate murder of innocent people – young, old, whole families, men, women and children – it makes no difference, as long as they kill.

But the "homicide bombers" are part of a larger problem: there cannot be, and there will not be, peace in the Middle East as long as Israel's enemies refuse to accept the legitimacy of the Jewish State. Nothing short of that will bring a cessation of violence. Israel is willing to acknowledge the legitimacy of others, but so far it has not been met with the kind of reciprocity that is necessary to create a livable future.

Some of my readers will think my portrayal of these issues is too simplistic, but sometimes the most complex matters in history are basically simple. In my opinion, the issue of "homicide bombers" and the root causes of the Mideast conflict fall into this category.

The death of a giant

The death last month of former Israeli Supreme Court Justice Haim Cohen leaves a giant void in Israel's judicial community. Described by many as "Israel's conscience," Cohen brought civil rights into the mainstream of Israeli public debate. After a decade in the attorney general's post, Cohen sat on the Supreme Court for 20 years (from 1961 to 1981). There, he said repeatedly – and ruled accordingly – that society would be judged by its treatment of the weak and disadvantaged.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

Cohen's legacy is particularly resonant today, when the limits of free speech and civil liberties are debated anew. At a recent meeting of Israel Television Channel 2's public council, philosopher Shlomo Ben-Yosef argued for limits on press freedom, due to the overriding value of the right to life. He argued that when the country is at war, even more limits are necessary.

No one would argue with Ben-Yosef in principle. Most democracies accept limits on certain freedoms while at war. But for Israel, the challenge is both different and greater. It has been formally at war for 54 years, and its emergency regulations, which grant the police and military broad powers, are renewed annually by the Knesset. For Israel, then, the challenge to its democracy and its commitment to individual rights is pervasive and constant. At issue is the threshold of tolerance for limits on civil rights.

In recent weeks, the debate has come to a head over statements by several Israeli human rights organizations, which have criticized some of the Israel Defence Forces' actions in the West Bank. This new "chilling effect" on free speech is far more prevalent than in the past. It stems from the personal vulnerability of Israelis in the aftermath of the horrific wave of terrorist attacks over Passover. While it may be of concern, this trend is not surprising. Israeli polls have always shown a link between people's willingness to suspend civil liberties and the extent of their concern for personal security.

The debate is even more complicated when it comes to Israel's Arab citizens. They are more than an ethnic and religious minority. For many, they are perceived as the enemy. Although the vast majority of Israel's 900;000 Arabs have remained loyal in practice to the state, they all support the Palestinian struggle against the Israeli presence in the West Bank and Gaza, and they question Israel's brand of ethnodemocracy, in which preferential treatment is granted to the majority. And while Israeli Jews are generally highly supportive of equal rights for citizens in a democracy, more than 60 per cent of them believe Israeli Arabs do not deserve equal treatment.

Israel's liberal elements have always argued that Israeli Arabs are citizens, above all, and that equality of resources and opportunity should be the goal. Ironically, for the first time ever, in his recent report, the Israeli State Comptroller criticized the inequality in allocation of resources to Arab municipalities. As attitudes towards Arabs are hardening in Israel, the comptroller called for improvements to the dire conditions of roads, sewage systems and other infrastructure needs.

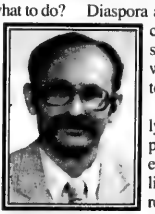
Prof. Ruth Gavison, one of Israel's leading legal scholars, wrote recently: "A nation that is itself a citizens' army cannot afford to stifle criticism and dissent. If it wants to be ultimately victorious in its existential battles, it must be prepared to deal head-on with criticism of its actions. It is true that many of our critics are enemies who simply want to undermine us. It is also true that much of the criticism is hypocritical. But we shall be making a huge mistake if we completely absolve ourselves, as a result, of a critical analysis of policy and its implementation in the field. And if we label all our critics anti-Semitic, we shall be making an even greater mistake. This would simply increase our enemies' hostility and create suspicion and resentment among our supporters."

Justice Cohen would likely have agreed. It isn't easy to deal with the consequences of being an open democracy, especially in a hostile region and world. Israel has been remarkably successful in maintaining both its openness and a vigorous debate on human rights. In the final analysis, if forced to choose between a society with active, dissenting human rights organizations, and one without them, I choose the former.

Defending Israel to non-Jewish friends

Many Diaspora Jews may wish to help Israel, in the face of perceived unfair media coverage, international hypocrisy, and a rising tide of anti-Semitism often commingled with anti-Zionism. But what to do?

Trips to Israel can certainly buoy the morale of Israelis in the face of the collapse of tourism and the cancellation of tours. Charitable contributions are also important, given that the Israeli economy has been suffering from both a general recession and the renewed intifadah.



Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

But most important, Diaspora Jews must use their contacts with the non-Jewish world to promote a case for Israel. In fact, there is no single case for Israel: there still remains a spectrum within the Zionist and pro-Israel Jewish world that stretches from right to left.

Those Canadian Jews who see themselves as liberals or progressives can make an appropriate case for Israel, directed to their non-Jewish friends and associates with similar orientations. Those who see themselves as hard-nosed conservatives can defend Israel to their like-minded colleagues. There are enough powerful arguments to sustain all positions.

The hard part is for Jews to feel enough confidence to risk potential discomfort by letting their non-Jewish friends, business associates and neighbours know exactly how they feel, and why. It is hard enough to do this in face-to-face contacts. Perhaps one way to start is through the Internet.

Over the past months and years the Internet has helped to create a robust "virtual" Jewish community. Concerned Jews, in the Diaspora and Israel, are in a worldwide caucus, distributing and exchanging the same articles, editorials, petitions, which seem, in one way or another, to help make Israel's case.

This is important, but it ultimately does little to enhance the Israeli position. These e-mails are forwarded to all the addresses on the various lists, to the point that Jews often receive the same article from many sources. A good example is the recent "J'accuse-like" polemic from Italian journalist Oriana Fallaci, the progressive journalist known for sympathies with the Palestinians. Fallaci attacked the left-wing European intelligentsia, media, governments, society and churches for their unfair targeting of Israel and for the rise of anti-Semitism.

The problem is that most of the address lists used for these Middle East e-mail relays are full of Jewish names. So Jews send e-mails to each other, making themselves feel good. But they are preaching to the converted.

What would be more effective is for Jews to mount, at the individual and private level, their own campaigns aimed at their non-Jewish friends, work colleagues, and neighbours. This would mean adding select non-Jews to e-mail address lists. This could be done slowly at first, by including mainly those who would be more interested or receptive. Try e-mail at first, and then a conversation over lunch, coffee or a beer.

But this is hard to do. It is far easier to attend a Jewish rally in defence of Israel than to bring up the Middle East over lunch at work. Regardless of how the issue arises, many Jews will feel uncomfortable if they are too up front, too honest in articulating their concerns or criticizing, say, the CBC, the UN or the Canadian government. Most Jews do not want to appear too narrowly focused on Jewish self-interest or the welfare of Israel. They do not want to risk antagonizing friends and co-workers with special pleading, or appearing to dwell excessively on the issue. Diaspora Jews want to fit in.

On most days, on most matters, Canadian Jews are indeed like everyone else and can fit in well in every domain of Canadian life. But when it comes to Israel, there is a difference.

The American sociologist Marshall Sklare used to claim that insecure Jews in the 1950s played an "ambassadorial" role in their social relations with non-Jews. They considered themselves to be ambassadors of the Jewish people and, therefore, could never be honest or open in their social interactions.

For most matters, that insecurity is now gone or diminished. But not regarding Israel. Diaspora Jews are ambassadors for Israel and should not shrink from the role if they wish to help the Jewish State.

The Kirshner File

Israeli Arab MKs increasingly outspoken

In a landmark decision that generated surprisingly little attention in the Israeli press, the Knesset's law committee recently gave second and third readings to legislation that would ban political parties and candidates from running for office if they are deemed disloyal to Israel. Under the proposed bill, which the Knesset has yet to pass, disloyalty would be defined as an expression of support for an armed struggle aimed at Israel, incitement to racism or denial of Israel's right to exist as a Jewish and democratic state.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

MK Yisrael Katz (Likud), one of its sponsors, admits that the bill is largely designed to rein in outspoken Arab members of the Knesset, chief among them being Azmi Bishara. Israel has accused them of sedition and/or incitement, Public Security Minister Uzi Landau has denounced them as "agents" of the Palestinian Authority and Herut party parliamentarian Michael Kleiner has branded them as "criminal MKs."

Bishara, one of 13 Arab MKs, was indicted last November for praising Hezbollah and thus encouraging acts of violence against Israel, and of illegally organizing trips to Syria for Israeli Arabs. On Feb. 27, his parliamentary immunity having been removed, Bishara went on trial in Nazareth, his home town, before a panel of three judges. Bishara's trial, which may last as long as a year, could lead to a maximum sentence of three years.

The main charges against Bishara – a Christian Arab who contested the 1999 prime ministerial election until he was persuaded to drop out to help Labour party challenger Ehud Barak defeat Likud incumbent Benjamin Netanyahu – stem from two inflammatory speeches he delivered last year.

Shortly after Israel's unilateral withdrawal from southern Lebanon, he talked about the intifadah, telling a gathering in the Israeli Arab town of Umm al-Fahm: "Lebanon, the weakest of the Arab countries, has presented a tiny model from which... we can draw the conclusions necessary for success and victory." Then, in a reference to the Six Day War, he added: " Hezbollah has won, and for the first time since 1967, we have known the taste of victory."

A month later, at a memorial meeting held in Syria to mark the first anniversary of the death of Hafez Assad, the former Syrian president, Bishara referred to the "heroic resistance" mounted by Hezbollah, and called on Arab leaders to back the Palestinian uprising in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Bishara, who vehemently attacked Israel's Operation Defensive Shield in the West Bank, is not the only Arab MK in hot water with the authorities. In the past year, four of his Arab colleagues – Ahmed Tibi, Taleb a-Sanaa, Mohammed Barakeh and Abdel-Malik Dehamshe – have been accused of incitement and sedition by Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein.

Tibi, who has served as Yasser Arafat's advisor on Israeli affairs, visited the Palestinian Authority chairman when he was besieged by Israel at his headquarters in Ramallah, and then is said to have joined Arafat in chanting: "A million martyrs are marching to Jerusalem." The reference, of course, was to suicide bombers, whom Palestinians generally hail as "martyrs." An urbane medical doctor who often appears on Israeli TV, Tibi has excoriated Gen. Shaul Mofaz, the Israeli chief of staff, as a "murderer," equated the Sept. 11 destruction of the World Trade Center with Israel's occupation and denounced Israel's "policies of aggression" against the Palestinians and their leaders.

Sanaa voiced support for a Palestinian shooting attack outside the Ministry of Defence in Tel Aviv in the spring of 2001 during which several passersby were injured. In an interview with Abu Dhabi television rebroadcast on Israel TV, he reportedly described the assault – the first of its kind during the current intifadah – as "an act of special quality," since it was supposedly directed against soldiers rather than civilians.

Ahmed Tibi

Barakeh, having labelled Israel's targeted killing of Mustafa Zibri – the leader of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine – a "criminal act," called on Israel to "abandon warfare" and return immediately to negotiations with the Palestinians.

Dehamshe sent a letter of condolence to President Bashir Assad of Syria following the deaths of three Syrian soldiers in an Israeli air raid on a Syrian radar station in Lebanon last summer. Israel bombed the site after an Israeli soldier was killed by Hezbollah in a disputed area of the Golan Heights known as Shabaa Farms. Dehamshe said he regretted Israel's "abominable attack" and urged "Arab unification to bring an end to Israel's radical actions."

In self-defence, Arab MKs argue that they are being persecuted and that the principles of free speech are being flouted by Israel. As duly elected parliamentarians, they say, they have a right to express themselves freely.

Bishara, an academic who entered politics six years ago, maintains that his trial and tribulations are intended to have a chilling effect on Israel's one-million-strong Arab minority, many of whom are the descendants of Palestinians who remained in their villages and towns during the 1948 Arab-Israeli war.

It is indeed true that his trial has heightened the feeling among Israeli Arabs, comprising about 20 per cent of Israel's population, that they are victims of official discrimination in terms of government services in budgetary allocations and education grants.

Azmi Bishara

Claiming they are second-class citizens, Israeli Arabs complain that their communities suffer from unacceptably high levels of poverty and unemployment, that government employment opportunities for Arabs are scarce and that much of their land has been confiscated. (The furor surrounding the Arab villages of Ikrit and Biram, whose residents have not been allowed to return to their homes despite a Supreme Court ruling in their favour, is symptomatic of the unresolved land issue.)

By all accounts, the situation is particularly bleak among Bedouins. Sixty per cent live below the poverty line, about half of all their households depend on welfare and at least 30 per cent of their men are out of work. Topping these grim statistics is the baleful fact that the Bedouin infant mortality rate is three times that of Jews.

Elie Rekhess, a Tel Aviv University scholar who studies Israeli Arabs, wrote recently that "the socio-economic crisis in the Arab sector is worsening," while the government's "neglect" of Arab communities continues. Successive prime ministers, from David Ben-Gurion to Barak, have promised to improve their status. There have been improvements, but they have generally fallen short of Arab hopes and expectations.

In short, Israeli Arabs have been alienated and radicalized. As Rekhess put it: "There is a marked radicalization within the Israeli Arab community and this is not just on the part of the leadership, but also on the grassroots level."

The unprecedented riots in the Arab sector in October 2000, during which 13 Arabs were killed, still resonate bitterly, contributing to the belief that the police officers who fired on the demonstrations were trigger-happy. The Or Commission, which is investigating these allegations, has received telling information that the police, lacking non-lethal means to disperse the protesters, used live ammunition instead.

The rioting was undoubtedly touched off by Israeli Arab sympathy for the intifadah, but the simmering anger over their status in Israeli society was an important contributing factor as well.

Yet, since the establishment of the Jewish state in 1948, only a handful of Israeli Arabs have been imprisoned for committing terrorism or treason, and only one Israeli Arab has been a suicide bomber.

Although the silent majority of Israeli Arabs probably seek the path of greater integration into Israel's mainstream, a significant number want Israel to be a secular state, or as Bishara and other Arab MKs have demanded, a "state for all its citizens" in which its Zionist symbols – notably the national flag and anthem – would be abolished.

Israel, he claims, cannot be a Jewish state and a democracy – a view staunchly rejected by most Israeli Jewish liberals, who call for equal rights for Jews and Arabs.

Apart from the problem posed by outspoken Arab MKs, Israel faces the spectre of the increasingly popular and confident Islamic Movement. Shaker Hubeishi, the Israeli suicide bomber who blew up three civilians in Nahariya last September, was a member or sympathizer. Ra'ad Salah, the leader of its more radical northern branch, was recently quoted as saying that Israel must return six per cent of its territory to the original Arab owners. Three months ago, Israel banned him from leaving the country, signalling a tougher approach to the Islamic Movement.

It's clear that a troubling proportion of Arab citizens are disaffected with their place in Israeli society. Israel's challenge is to address their grievances without compromising its fundamental Jewish character.

Sam and Lola Faivish donated an ambulance to MDA.

Ambulance dedicated in daughter's memory

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sam and Lola Faivish, longtime members of Beth Jacob Synagogue, have dedicated an ambulance to Magen David Adom in memory of their daughter Yona Rabinowicz.

Rabinowicz, wife of Ralph, and mother of Jesse, Danelle, Joanna and Kari, died four years ago at age 48 after an illness.

Sam Faivish, a Holocaust survivor who is the "permanent" State of Israel Bonds chair at the synagogue, said they donated the ambulance on behalf of the Rabinowicz family, as well as the Faivishes' son Jerry, his wife and four children.

Their ambulance, a mobile intensive care unit which functions as a hospital on wheels, contains standard and high-tech equipment, and oxygen and medical supplies. The cost is $106,000.

At a recent ambulance dedication held at Beth Jacob Synagogue, Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and an honorary director of Canadian Magen David Adom (MDA) for Israel, said he has known the Faivish family for many years, and the ambulance will stand as a testament to their daughter.

"They are demonstrating what we all must do as Jews, especially now. The Jewish community is calling on all of us to do what we can to ensure the longevity of Israel.

"The MDA is the only board on which I sit, so it is doubly important for me to bring honour to the Faivish family for leading the way," he said.

Meir Romem, Israel's Consul General in Toronto, said he does not know of any organization that does more important work than MDA. "Israel today is living under special circumstances. It is wonderful that people here are helping."

Citing MDA statistics, Alan Spector, a past president of Canadian MDA, said that between Sept. 29, 2000 and May 1, 2002, MDA took care of 3,695 casualties in Israel.

"Of them, 397 were killed, 313 severely injured, 434 moderately injured, and 2,551 lightly injured, among them 11 MDA crew members."

He said MDA has had 77 vehicles damaged, one blood machine and one ambulance stolen, five ambulances broken into, and two armoured ambulances hit by bullets.

Faivish said that "these are tragic events and it makes me happy that we can help people in the name of our daughter. She would be very proud."

A CHEQUE OF LIFE:
Eli Goldberg, president of Don Mills Lodge, B'nai Brith Canada, presents a cheque for $2,000 to Canadian Magen David Adom vice-president Gerald Berley. The money will be used for the purchase of medical equipment.

Teen fund-raising whiz nets thousands for cancer

By ERIN SILVER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Little kids barely four feet tall line up at lunch to buy raffle tickets for Phil Birnbaum's cash-for-cancer lottery.

To witness this scene is to witness the power of one person to make a difference in the world.

By the end of his fourth annual draw on May 15, Phil will have raised a total of more than $10,000 for the Canadian Cancer Society (CCS).

This is no small feat for someone who started fund-raising at the age of 10, two years after his father died of non-Hodgkin's lymphoma.

In those two years, Phil came up with a way to remember his father, Perry, and thank the CCS for the all the help it provided while Phil's dad was sick.

Former Ontario premier Mike Harris with Phil Birnbaum.

"At first I thought of holding a bake sale," says Phil, now 14 and sitting behind a table topped with prizes during his lunch hour at Pleasantville Public School, an elementary and middle school, where he and a number of his friends can be found every day from April to mid-May selling raffle tickets to students.

"But people get tired of bake sales, and they'll get fat," he says.

"With a raffle it's a win-win situation. I want everyone to win."

Indeed, Phil is determined to ensure that everyone – from families touched by cancer to students too young to know what the disease entails – wins something.

There's the Big Draw, which was scheduled for May 15 and was open to the public. Prizes included gift certificates to a spa and a weekend getaway hotel package.

For every $10 spent on raffle tickets, a second entry went into a bonus draw for a leather baseball jacket.

In addition, there is a weekly draw available only to Pleasantville students. A few weeks ago, the prize was a house made of chocolate.

And there's more for the students.

"Students who spend $2 get a key chain. Those who spend $10 get a free CD from Sony," explains Phil.

"I try to give them an incentive to buy tickets. Not only do they help a good cause, but they get fantastic prizes."

Phil works hard each year to get the prizes, which are donated by a range of sponsors, including the Toronto Maple Leafs, Famous Players movie theatres and the CN Tower.

In November, he and his friends write a letter, explaining the raffle and asking for help.

"I ride on my bike each weekend and go to local businesses to receive prizes. Hopefully it's not too cold. I fax or e-mail the bigger companies, depending on what they prefer. Two weeks later I call them up and ask if they're able to help," says Phil, who appeared on Canadian Living television at age 12 as a fund-raising expert.

Then the prizes begin to roll in.

"One day I was in class writing a math test when this package came in from the Maple Leafs. I opened it up and inside was a jersey autographed by Tie Domi with a sticker of authenticity," he says, his voice rising and his eyes widening with excitement.

Some prizes are so good that Phil wants to win them for himself, but he says it wouldn't be right.

"If I were to enter and win, it would be stingy because people would think it was rigged. One time my mom won the deluxe weekend getaway, but she gave it back."

Even after all the draws are over and the prizes won, Phil's job isn't done. He writes thank-you cards to all the companies and people who donated prizes to his cause.

Phil has won a number of honours for his hard work and dedication. In 2000, he won the Judy Stein Junior Volunteer of the Year Award, established by Beit Rayim Synagogue, and he was named the Ontario Junior Citizen of the Year by the Ontario Community Newspapers Association. In 2001, he earned the Town of Richmond Hill Achievement Award for volunteerism and dedication to the community, becoming the youngest-ever recipient of the award.

Recently, he was asked to make a 40-minute speech for the Canadian National Synagogue Youth on "the power of one." It was his first major speaking appearance.

"There's no way I could talk for 40 minutes, so I'm going to talk for 15 to 20 minutes about what one person can achieve," he says.

"All it takes is one idea and that could change everything."

The words begin to flow faster.

"Put the idea on paper, show it to someone and it can expand. You just have to put your mind to it."

This year he will be graduating from Pleasantville and moving on to high school. His younger sister, Deborah, who often helps out at lunch, will take over in his place.

In his graduating yearbook, he's going to be named 'Person most likely to find a cure for cancer,' but Phil says that's not going to happen.

"I won't be a doctor because I can't stand the sight of blood, but I love fund-raising."

His goal is to raise $1 million for the CCS, perhaps by holding charity golf tournaments, but as a career, he's still undecided as to what he wants to do.

"My first job is to graduate from Grade 8 and then I'll decide from there."

For more information or to donate prizes for next year's raffle, visit Phil's Web site at www.geocities.com/philsraffle.

Council brings youth together

By SHIRA ZELIGER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A mosaic of left-wing and right-wing, secular and religious, male and female teenage Jews listen attentively to two representatives from the Labour Zionist youth movement Habonim Dror as they speak about the ideals and history of their organization.

Some nod their heads in approval, while others congregate after the meeting to discuss the differences between Habonim Dror and other youth organizations.

This scene one winter Sunday at the local headquarters of the National Conference of Synagogue Youth, a youth group under Orthodox auspices, was part of the Toronto Jewish Youth Council's (TJYC) "Bus Tour."

For four hours, representatives of eight youth movements in the Greater Toronto Area travelled to headquarters around the city to familiarize themselves with the diversity of Jewish youth groups in Toronto.

"The bus tour was a fantastic opportunity for the current leaders of Toronto's Jewish youth organizations – and future leaders of our community – to educate themselves about the history, ideology and structure of the various groups," said Michael Ferman, the president of the Eastern Canadian region of United Synagogue Youth, the youth arm of the Conservative movement.

Members of the council (which began with the youth movements and now includes representatives from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto – CHAT) felt it was necessary to hold the tour prior to implementing TJYC programming, in order to make each representative sensitive to the others they would be working with.

The TJYC, formed in October 2001, operates under the auspices of the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education (BJE) and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

The constituent organizations are B'nai Brith Youth Organization, Bnei Akiva, Habonim Dror, Hashomer Hatzair, NSCY, North American Federation of Temple Youth, United Synagogue Youth (USY), Canadian Young Judaea and CHAT.

Since October, two representatives from each organization, along with second-year York University student Daniel Held, the council's facilitator, have gathered monthly to discuss pluralistic Jewish programming and to become better acquainted with each other's organizations.

Staff members of the respective organizations also meet regularly to facilitate the joint programming.

"I wasn't aware of all of the impressive youth activities from across the spectrum until I became involved with the youth council," said Noam Lockshin, an OAC student at Yeshivat Or Chaim and a Bnei Akiva representative on TJYC.

"Because of the diversity of the representation, it won't be easy to reach any political or religious consensus, but we can successfully co-operate on tikkun olam issues," he added.

On March 24, the TJYC and members of its constituent organizations gathered in support for Israel at Mel Lastman Square for the community Stand With Israel rally, with a youth kick-off 45 minutes before the main event.

"The ruach and energy emanating from Toronto's Jewish youth was absolutely incredible," said Sara Davidovits, an OAC student at Ulpanat Orot High School and a council representative from Bnei Akiva.

The TJYC has organized other recent initiatives.

On April 17, each TJYC-affiliated movement created a poster board featuring a famous Zionist leader in Jewish history, and the posters were displayed at IsraelFest 2002 in Toronto. As well, one representative from each TJYC member organization was selected to participate in the community Yom Hazikaron ceremony April 15 at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation.

TJYC facilitator Held said the council's activities are important in the current climate.

"As the Jewish world battles the rise of anti-Semitic and anti-Israel sentiment, unity among the Jewish community is vital. The Toronto Jewish Youth Council is setting an example for the Jewish community at large by paving the way for the Jewish leaders of tomorrow to become active today," Held said.

"By combining the resources of all the representing organizations on the council, the possibilities of what we can achieve are endless," said Erez Sussman, a TJYC representative from Hashomer Hatzair and a Grade 12 student at William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute.

For more information on the Toronto Jewish Youth Council, contact Held at daniel_held@edu.yorku.ca

REENA

Reena has been enhancing communities for more than twenty-eight years by enabling individuals with a developmental disability to live in comfort and dignity close to family and friends. Consequently, many of our residents are now senior citizens, with increased health, support and social concerns. About one third of Reena's current clients are now more than 50 years old; in less than a decade, more than half will be seniors. Seniors with developmental disabilities are in need of a unique set of supports to enable them to remain as independent as possible in their own community.

Jewish Life

The soft break

By RABBI MICHAEL SKOBAC

Rabbinic Reflections

There are three acts in the drama of history. Creation, the Revelation at Sinai, and the ultimate utopian Redemption. On the holiday of Shavuot, we rendezvous with the Creator to recharge our connection to the gift of Torah we received seven weeks after being liberated from Egypt 3314 years ago. It is noteworthy that in both Creation and Revelation, God is described as "speaking."

The etymological roots of "Torah" denote both instruction/teaching and shooting (a bow and arrow or rifle in modern Hebrew). The Torah doesn't simply convey ideas, but strives to generate their actualization. Torah's goal is not only to inform, but to transform.

Much of our communication is also designed to influence. And like God, we also find an audience that is often resistant to the direction of our communication. People have a tendency to see themselves as being basically OK, which creates a state of inertia to confront forces seeking change. Our challenge is how to pierce the defensive armour that we all too often encounter.

I witnessed something remarkable at a karate exhibition many years ago that shed some light on this issue for me. The demonstration commenced with the destruction of a cinderblock – shattered by a tremendously forceful blow. This was impressive, but we had all seen it done before, and if something is hit with enough force, it's bound to break. Later, the karate expert took a large rock, and, to the astonishment of everyone present, demolished it with the slightest tap of his fingertips!

The power of the "soft break" can be seen in how the Torah was transmitted to us at Mount Sinai.

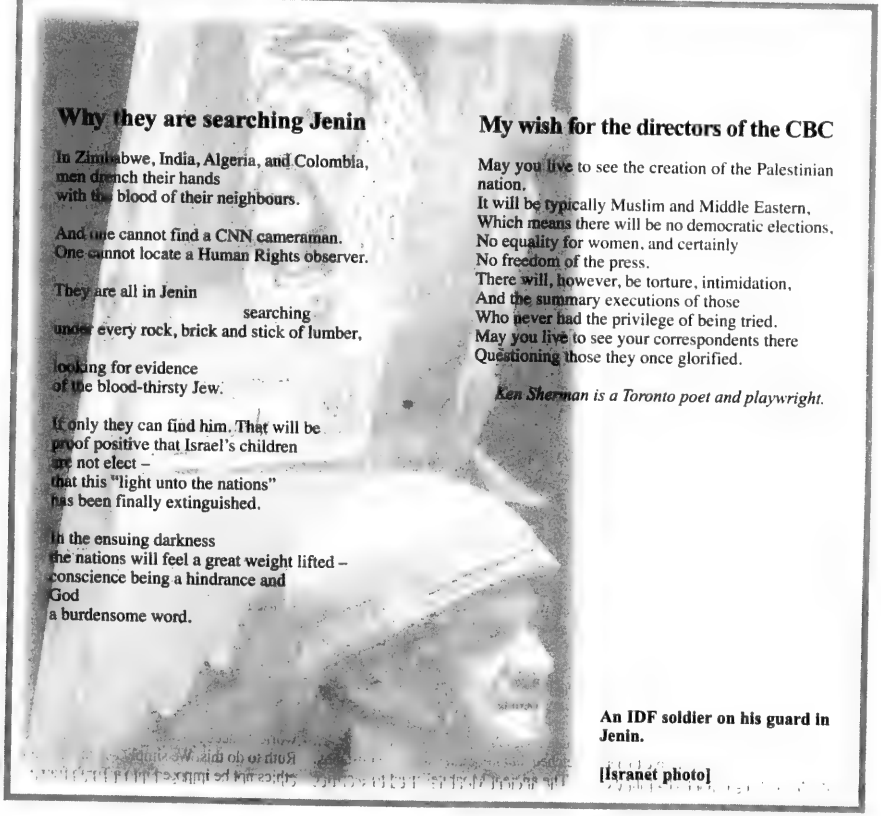
The Bible relates that the revelation of the Ten Commandments was a cataclysmic event – replete with thunder, lightning and smoking mountain. However, the impression created by this hard sell was rather short-lived. The Jewish people soon afterward were dancing at the feet of the Golden Calf. Upon seeing this, Moses smashed the two tablets containing the Decalogue, and ascended the mountain to pray for the forgiveness of the Jews. The Midrash Tanchuma tells us that the second tablets were given quietly, without all the fanfare. It was only this second revelation that had the power to create a lasting impression on our national consciousness.

Even if we have the truth in our hand, it rarely does any good to crack someone over the head with it. What is often resisted is not the content of our message, but its form.

The parable is often an effective means of communication because it is indirect and doesn't provoke a defensive posture. The prophet Nathan was able to bring King David to an "aha!" awakening in a very sensitive situation by employing this approach (2 Samuel 12:1-9).

Similarly, the Torah employs symbols such as the lowly hyssop plant to counter arrogance. The Sefat Emet explains that a frontal directive to be humble will only lead to an affected and superficial humility. Personal growth can't be instructed, it must come from within. Effective communication provides a stimulus for introspection; it doesn't overwhelm the listener with the force of its presentation. By giving breathing space to the listener, seeds of awareness can be planted that may lead to change. Our efforts to influence will be greatly enhanced if we remember what Elijah the Prophet experienced: the Lord was not to be heard in the wind, or the earthquake or the fire, but in the still small voice (I Kings 19:11-12).

Rabbi Skobac is the director of education and counselling with Jews for Judaism.



Why they are searching Jenin

In Zimbabwe, India, Algeria, and Colombia, men drench their hands
with the blood of their neighbours.

And one cannot find a CNN cameraman.
One cannot locate a Human Rights observer.

They are all in Jenin searching
under every rock, brick and stick of lumber, looking for evidence of the blood-thirsty Jew.

If only they can find him. That will be proof positive that Israel's children are not elect – that this "light unto the nations" has been finally extinguished.

In the ensuing darkness
the nations will feel a great weight lifted – conscience being a hindrance and God
a burdensome word.

My wish for the directors of the CBC

May you live to see the creation of the Palestinian nation.
It will be typically Muslim and Middle Eastern,
Which means there will be no democratic elections.
No equality for women, and certainly
No freedom of the press.
There will, however, be torture, intimidation,
And the summary executions of those
Who never had the privilege of being tried.
May you live to see your correspondents there
Questioning those they once glorified.

Megillat Ruth and the Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

"Do not urge me to leave you, to turn back and not follow you. For wherever you go, I will go; wherever you lodge, I will lodge; your people shall be my people, and your God my God." (Ruth 1:16)

Those beautiful words will be recited on Shavuot this Saturday morning as we remember the story of Naomi and the loyalty and love shown to her by her Moabite daughter-in-law, Ruth. The story tells how Ruth refuses to abandon her mother-in-law and how she eventually meets and marries Boaz. Megillat Ruth has inspired both classical and modern commentators, artists and poets. Today, insights into the story of Ruth from the World Wide Web.

There are many reasons why we read Megillat Ruth on Shavuot. Shavuot is known as the harvest festival of the first fruits. The crucial events in the story of Ruth occur during the harvest season [http://www.torah.org/advanced/mikra/5757/bm/Ruth1. html]. Just as the Jewish people received the Torah and commandments on Shavuot, Ruth as a convert to Judaism received the mitzvot on a personal basis [http://www.ohr.org.il/ special/shavuos/]. Tradition tells us that King David was born and died on Shavuot. The story of Ruth concludes by revealing that King David is Ruth's great-grandson [http://www.aish.com/holidays/shavuot/].

You can read the entire Book of Ruth online in English, and if you have Hebrew fonts installed, in Hebrew [http://www.breslov.com/bible/Ruth .htm]. If you can't wait to hear Ruth sung in shul, listen to it recited by Cantor Pinchas Rabinovicz at [http://www.613.org/shavuot.html].

There are several Web sites that challenge us to look at the story of Ruth and find lessons to live by. Here's something to think about from The Union of American Hebrew Congregation's Table Talk site: "Whether someone is born Jewish or converts, each of us chooses how we observe Judaism. What choices have you made about Judaism? What has influenced those choices?" [http://uahc.org/shabbat/stt/shavuot.html] The Shalom Center points out that when Naomi and Ruth returned to Israel in poverty, they were able to survive, since Jewish law required landowners like Boaz to provide them with grain. The site then asks what "If Ruth the Moabite Came to America Today?" "Imagine Boaz as the Jewish people in America today: well-off, comfortable, suddenly challenged by the poor and outcast. In this allegory… what should we be doing?" [http://www.shalomctr.org/html/seas05.html]

Aside from traditional rabbinical commentaries, the story of Ruth has inspired artists and poets for centuries. You can read Marge Piercy's poem Ruth and Naomi at Jewish Heritage Online Magazine [http://www.jhom.com/calendar/sivan/poem.htm]. One of the loveliest sites I've come across in quite a while is Women's Early Art created by Sarah Whitworth. In her section on Megillat Ruth, Whitworth illustrates the story with beautiful paintings by Rembrandt, William Blake, Chagall, Arthur Szyk and many others. A gorgeous site [http://www.womensearlyart.net/ruth/].

Finally, insight into Ruth's remarkable personality, from the Virtual Jerusalem: [http://207.168.91.4/vjholidays/shavuot/ruth.htm] "Among Biblical figures, Ruth, the Moabitess, is unique in that there is no criticism of her in Jewish sources. Although others were as great or greater than Ruth, their shortcomings are highlighted by the sages. Ruth, however – the epitome of modesty, idealism, and loyalty – is portrayed as being faultless."

Chag sameach.

Here is an update of two recent articles about the situation in Israel. Several readers have asked me to mention a site I hadn't seen before, Real-israel.com [www.real-israel. com]. There you'll find news and commentary drawn from major newspapers on the site, but the section I found very interesting reprinted recent editorials from such papers as the New York Times and the National Post. This site is run under the auspices of the Canadian Jewish Congress and the Canada Israel Committee.

And an addendum to the column about buying Israeli products on the Internet. Shop in Israel is a large, well-organized Web site with extensive links to Israeli e-retailers and exporters [http://www.shopinisrael.com]. You can browse souvenir Israeli T-shirts, check out some Israeli jewelry and in a case of old meets new, even order a shofar online! [http://www.shofarshop.com]

The ethical frame

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

This year, Shavuot is a much-awaited holiday. With the Jewish people and the Jewish state constantly at the forefront of world events lately, and very little of the news positive or reinforcing, Shavuot is a welcome guest.

For a brief window of time, the community can turn inwards and celebrate our relationship with the Torah. Shavuot, among other things, is the day on which we received the Torah at Mount Sinai. No matter where on the spectrum of Judaism we find ourselves, there is a moment of beautiful commonality for all Judaic branches intrinsically connected to the Torah, the tree of life.

Interestingly, while we are celebrating what seems to be a very internal holiday, we are reading the Book of Ruth, the story of a foreign woman.

Ruth, a Moabite, follows Naomi, an Israelite, back to her homeland, ancient Israel. Naomi at first resists Ruth and implores her to return to her family in Moab. Only after Ruth has pledged allegiance to Naomi, her people and God, does Naomi stop insisting that Ruth depart.

In fact, the reader sees Ruth as true to her word, for although she is poor, she follows the Torah's laws of charity and gleans in the fields along with the other poor people. She does not bring her former traditions into her new identity but accepts the values of the Torah.

With the story of Ruth, then, we are reminded of two things. First, there are righteous people among the foreign nations. Moab was a nation with whom Israel had waged war and yet we cannot deny there were righteous people among them. Secondly, although there are righteous foreigners, if we have to live together, there cannot be divergent standards of right and wrong.

Whereas one can debate the interpretation or application of a given law in Torah, one cannot debate that the laws and the values they reflect are the foundations of a Jewish society.

The Torah lays the ground rules for ethical living and for relationships with all people. The study of Torah allows us to bring whatever contemporary event occurs into the frame of Torah and debate how it fits. The debate is rarely smooth and the fit is often stretched, but the frame always withstands.

The ancient Moabites used to sacrifice their children to their gods. If Ruth had insisted on bringing ancient Moabite practices to her life in Israel, we would have rejected her and her practices. There are some things Torah does not leave open to debate. There is a standard of morals that cannot be compromised. Ruth understood that to participate in a Jewish society means to accept that there is a language of ethics already in place, which has its own vocabulary.

Once that vocabulary has been accepted, the debate can begin, and a debate is necessary, but it must use the words of the ethical system we have.

A midrash in Taanit states: "Why are the words of Torah like fire? A fire is built by many logs and the words of Torah survive only through many minds." We need not all agree on how a contemporary event or response reflects the values of Torah. By engaging in the debate, we are ensuring that the vocabulary thrives.

Torah contains infinite truths, and by committing yourself to it, you gain the right to argue, debate, disagree and add your voice to the dialogue of study. We do not ask the world to accept Torah. Naomi did not ask Ruth to do this. We simply ask that foreign ethics not be imposed into a Torah frame.

New Pension Rights for Ghetto Work in Poland
Up until this time, pensions from the German Social Security System were paid exclusively to workers in the Lodz Ghetto who were subsequently residents in Germany between May 1945 and December 31, 1949. This is being replaced by a new regulation.
1. Pensions will be paid to workers in all Ghettos in Poland, provided they were in the annexed or occupied territories.
2. Work in the Ghettos will in the future be evaluated on a higher scale.
3. A subsequent residence in Germany is no longer required. Also, those who had left Germany as displaced persons after December 31, 1949 will now become eligible.
4. The pensions will be paid retroactively to 1997. (Retirement or widow's pensions).
5. Application must be submitted before June 30, 2003

ESTATE & WEALTH TRANSFER SEMINAR FOR WOMEN

Today, women are taking much better care of themselves physically, but the same can't always be said of their estate planning. To determine if this statement applies to you, ask yourself:

- Is my will current?
- Who will inherit my estate and who will pay for the estate fees and taxes?
- Can I reduce this tax burden for my beneficiaries?
- How would trusts help me?
- Should I make charitable donations part of my estate planning?
- Can I reduce my probate fees?

If you have answered "I don't know" to even one of these questions, you could benefit from our estate & wealth transfer seminar.

Our speakers will include:

Charlotte Haber, CA Karen Slezak, CA, CFP Deborah Stern, CA

When?
Wednesday, May 29th from 11:30 am to 1:30 pm (lunch will be provided).
RSVP by May 24th as seating is limited to 15 participants.

Lawyers jockey over Seifert court documents

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Government lawyers are asking Federal Court to strike out sections of Michael Seifert's legal defence in which the alleged war criminal argues that former citizenship and immigration minister Elinor Caplan exhibited a "Jewish animosity" against him.

The allegations of bias and conflict of interest are not supported by any documentary evidence and Seifert "impugns the moral character of the (former) Minister who has initiated these proceedings," the Crown's documents contend.

Crown lawyers argue that Seifert's claims are frivolous, malicious and designed "to cast unreasonable aspersions on the minister."

Seifert, 78, is a former member of the Nazi SS who was convicted in absentia by an Italian court for war crimes committed in 1944 and 1945 at the Bolzano transit camp. He was found to have taken part in the brutal murder of 11 prisoners.

Following his November 2000 conviction in Italy, the federal Citizenship and Immigration Department launched denaturalization proceedings to remove his citizenship. More recently, Seifert was arrested and denied bail after the government of Italy initiated extradition proceedings against him on nine counts of murder.

In court documents related to the citizenship case, Seifert's lawyer, Doug Christie, claims a statement by Caplan in which she expressed "delight in signing what she calls 'Nazi war criminals' into deportation" creates a reasonable apprehension of bias.

Caplan "expressed Jewish loyalty and affirmed her own Jewish ethnic or religious background," Seifert's legal argument states. Furthermore, she expressed a "Jewish ritual significance to an act of signing deportation orders which rationally denote a motive of revenge," the defence documents state.

Christie is apparently referring to a speech delivered in Ottawa by Caplan in September 2000 at an event honouring Holocaust survivors.

In the speech, Caplan recounted Canada's mixed record on dealing with refugees and outlined Canada's policy of welcoming immigrants while deporting those who entered the country by lying.

"When the procedure for the revocation of citizenship has reached its end, when all appropriate measures have been taken to ensure fairness, when cabinet has weighed all considerations in making the final decision, and we are all in agreement, then citizenship is revoked.

"One of my first official duties in becoming minister was to revoke the citizenship of two Nazi war criminals. And as I signed, I silently said the Kaddish."

Seifert contends that statement indicated public misfeasance of duty.

The court has yet to rule on the Crown's request to strike out that portion of Seifert's defence arguments.

In a related matter, B.C. Supreme Court Judge Linda Loo denied Seifert's request for bail pending an extradition hearing. Loo said his release might undermine confidence in the administration of justice.

The Vancouver Sun reported that Loo outlined details of the Italian court's decision, including the findings that Seifert beat prisoners before shooting them, savagely beat a teenager with a stick, hanged a prisoner on the fence until he died and gouged out a prisoner's eyes.

Golf tournament to fund research fellow

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Charles Krowitz died two years ago at age 30, his family was determined to turn his death into something positive.

Krowitz, a husband and father of an infant son, died of Burkitt's lymphoma, a rare, highly aggressive B-cell tumour that affects mainly males in his age group.

Patients – the disease strikes only about 100 people a year in North America – are usually diagnosed at a late stage of the disease and only 45 per cent survive five years; Krowitz had been diagnosed six months before his death.

At his shivah, his parents Barry and Penny decided that because their son had been a huge sports fan and an avid golfer, they would establish a cancer research fund at Mount Sinai Hospital and run a golf tournament in his memory.

The planned a small golf day for family and friends, but "the tournament took on a life of its own," said Penny Krowitz, who organized it with, among others, her husband, and Charles' in-laws Ron and Elda Sparaga.

They had expected 70 people, but ended up with 89 golfers and 159 people for dinner.

"It was a warm and caring tournament. It gave people an opportunity to express their feelings about losing Charles and allowed them to express their sympathy," she said.

They raised $14,000, said Krowitz, but donated only $10,000 to Mount Sinai because they wanted to use the extra money to start a fund for Burkitt's Lymphoma research.

They were put in touch with Dr. Mark Minden, a researcher in lymphoma and leukemia at Princess Margaret Hospital, and decided to transfer their fund to that hospital, in order to to provide a research fellow to conduct research into Burkitt's lymphoma.

Currently, they are putting the finishing touches on their plans for this year's tournament, the Charles Krowitz Woodchuck Golf Classic to be held at the Glen Eagle Golf Club in Bolton on July 9.

To date, they have almost $40,000 in corporate sponsors, which will go towards the $60,000 it costs annually to fund the research fellow.

'Walk with Israel' planned for May 20

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Toronto's annual walk in support of Israel has a new name this year. It's the Walk With Israel, and organizers are emphasizing the "With," says walk co-chair Elyza Litwin Polsky.

The event, to be held Victoria Day Monday, is expected to draw record numbers – estimates are running as high as 20,000 to 30,000 – including a significant contingent of non-Jewish participants.

Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, said this is the first year organizers are reaching out to the non-Jewish community, specifically the Christian community.

"In the very recent past they have shown a passionate interest in wanting to stand with us on the State of Israel," he said, referring particularly to the Apr. 21 rally in Ottawa. Participants included six busloads of Christians from Toronto and almost as many from Hamilton.

CJC's outreach to the Christian community, at the request of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, under whose auspices the walk takes place, was prompted in large part by calls and e-mails from Christians asking how they could show their solidarity with Israel.

Other innovations this year include a new route and a new location for the post-walk festival. The 5-km walk will begin and end at Skydome. Checkpoints along the way will be located at St. Andrews Playground, Bellevue Square and Nathan Phillips Square.

Raanan Gissin, Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's principal spokesperson and key advisor, will speak at the festival. There will also be games, activities, music and vendors, said Litwin Polsky. "We've gone all out."

Organizers have been torn between wanting to celebrate Israel and at the same time wanting to recognize that there are victims of terror, said Litwin Polsky. "Whatever the situation is, we have to show we're going to survive and stick together, to show our support."

Walkers (and runners, who will set out at 10:15, 15 minutes before the walk begins) will also have an opportunity to show support by signing a petition calling on the Canadian government to hold Hezbollah, Lebanon, Syria and Iran accountable for the welfare of four Israeli hostages or the return of their remains for proper burial.

Renanah Goldhar, co-chair of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation's Israel Action committee, has collected 5,000 signatures for the petition since November and is aiming for 10,000 before she sends it.

The crisis in Israel has influenced the walk's agenda, and has also prompted UJA Federation to start Campaign 2003 several months ahead of schedule. The official launch was held last week, four months ahead of schedule, but telethons got under way early last month and have already raised more than $26 million for social services in Israel.

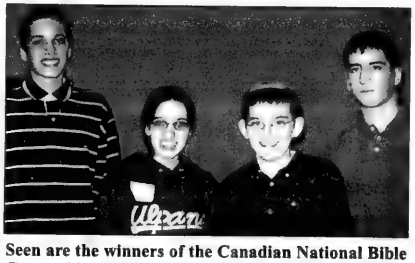
Last year walkers raised $300,000, said Abe Glowinsky, Litwin Polsky's co-chair.

Bible contest draws almost 200 kids

TORONTO — The UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education of Toronto hosted the Canadian National Bible Contest April 28-29.

Close to 200 students participated from 30 schools across Canada in Victoria, Vancouver, Winnipeg, London, Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal.

The winners of the high school division are: Michael Kurin, CHAT Richmond Hill, and Hillel Nadler, Yeshivat Or Chaim, both in Toronto, tied for first; Leah Breslow, Ulpanat Orot, Toronto, was third; and Gilad Ben-Shach, Bialik High School, Montreal, was fourth. All four will represent Canada in next year's International Bible Contest in Israel.



Seen are the winners of the Canadian National Bible Contest high school division: from left, Michael Kurin, CHAT Richmond Hill, Toronto; Leah Breslow, Ulpanat Orot, Toronto; Hillel Nadler, Yeshivat Or Chaim, Toronto; and Gilad Ben-Shach, Bialik High School, Montreal.

Other finalists in the high school division include Daniel Gutenberg, Yeshivat Or Chaim, Toronto; and Raphael Rush, CHAT Tenenbaum campus, Toronto.

The winners of the other divisions are as follows:

Grades 7-8 Hebrew division: Shoshana Warner, Eitz Chaim Viewmount, Toronto, first; Joshua Gutenberg, Netivot HaTorah, Toronto, second; David Pellow, Netivot HaTorah, Toronto, third.

Grade 7-8 English division: Sheldon Paquin, Temple Israel, Ottawa, first; Erin Brassel, United Congregational Schools, Toronto, second; Joshua Silver, Beth Tikvah, Toronto, third.

Grade 5-6 Hebrew division: Joshua Satok, Associated Neptune, Toronto, first; Maya Harel-Sterling, Hebrew Foundation School, Montreal, second; Ron Baruch, Associated Atkinson, Toronto, third.

Grade 5-6 English division: Ilana Decter, Congregation Emanuel, Victoria, first; Yonatan Clark, Congregation Emanuel, Victoria, second; Sharon Green, Temple Israel, Ottawa, third.

On Campus

Most Ont. campuses lack formal faith day policy

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Most universities and colleges in Ontario have at least a "quasi-formal" policy allowing students to request religious accommodation when exams or important events occur on religious holidays, according to a recent survey by Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region (CJC).

However, only 25 per cent of the approximately 50 institutions surveyed have a written policy. "I think that's a challenge for institutions in Ontario, and I think it's a challenge that can be easily met," said Len Rudner, CJC's director of community relations.

Congress undertook the survey after a major career fair for business, engineering and computer science students was held last fall at the University of Western Ontario on Yom Kippur.

About 60 per cent of the institutions sent responses. "I think it was sufficient to allow us to draw some conclusions," Rudner said.

The surveys were sent to the office of the president of each institution in January. Five questions were asked, with the following results:

- Twenty-seven per cent of schools indicate major faith days on their calendars.
- Twelve per cent have a policy prohibiting or strongly discouraging scheduling events on those days.
- For schools without such a policy, 4 per cent have a policy of scheduling alternate dates for affected students.
- Four per cent of schools have a policy ensuring that exams are not scheduled on faith days.
- Likewise, 4 per cent have a policy to ensure that assignments need not be handed in on faith days.

York University, which scheduled exams on Saturday this year, has in place all the policies addressed in the survey. Rudner had no comment about the situation at York, in which CJC is not directly involved.

Rudner said "quasi-formal policies" were not addressed in the actual survey, but emerged as a trend – usually in the form of a commitment to respect diversity or multiculturalism – that he said it would have been unfair to ignore.

"That's positive," said Rudner, who recalled his own student days in the late 1970s at the University of Toronto, when his request to modify his exam schedule because of Passover was not viewed favourably. "Things have changed, largely for the better."

'We're hoping the universities will rectify their policies'

A follow-up letter sent by CJC last week strongly recommended that "all universities and colleges in Ontario develop and publish a policy that specifically outlines institutional commitment to the principle of religious accommodation in student life and outlines the roles and responsibilities of both students and administrators to achieve this goal."

Enclosed with the letter was CJC's 12-page Guide to Jewish Customs and Practices for Employers and Educators.

Frank Bialystok, chair of CJC's community relations committee, said he was "quite surprised" by the results of the survey. "With everything we've been through – multiculturalism, anti-racism – the onus is still on the student to go to the professor to ask for some change. That shouldn't have to be…We're hoping that by drawing attention to this, the universities will rectify their policies."

UJA campaign gets early launch

Israel will not be defeated, he said. "We don't have a choice. And we've kind of grown to like who we are, as imperfect as we are… I couldn't think of any place else being home."

The premises that led Israel into the peace process – its democratic political system and its military and economic strength – are still valid, Pinkas said.

Israel's economy is still stronger than any Arab economy, he noted. "Our GDP per capita is $18,000 [US]. It's down from [$18,400]. For comparison, Syria has a GDP per capita of $1,200." Israel even compares favourably to Spain, which has a GDP per capita of $17,000, Pinkas said.

"We need to find a way to separate and cohabit, hopefully in a peaceful way." This is important to maintain a Jewish majority in Israel and to maintain a democracy. "We cannot, should not… have 3.3 million Palestinians under our control."

It is "almost impossible to negotiate a serious deal with people who treat truth as something that is expedient but not necessary," Pinkas said.

If there are not major fundamental reforms in the Palestinian Authority, Israel will have to consider unilateral steps ranging from buffer zones to full-fledged separation along the lines of the Berlin Wall or barbed-wire fences, said Pinkas, qualifying his assessment by adding that this is not government policy.

"Israel is strong, powerful and confident, but it's also bleeding, tired and confused, because everything we tried with the Palestinians did not work."

FEELING CONNECTED

On a blustery winter day, six school buses braved the deep snow to take the grade sevens to a celebration of their bar and bat mitzvahs. After a student-led tefillah (prayer service), the children watched a presentation on heroes and listened as guest speakers talked about their connection to the community.

It was just one of many special events planned for students at Associated Hebrew Schools Middle School. In addition to celebrations of Jewish holidays and assemblies, students can participate in a winter sports day, hockey team, basketball team, Rikudiyah (Israeli dance), public speaking contests in Hebrew and English, an annual school play and many class trips.

"Our goal is to educate a generation of knowledgeable and intelligent Jews, committed to their people, to Torah and Canadian life," says Rabbi Pinchas Brumer, Middle School Principal. Students put together gift bags with socks, scarves and personal notes for the homeless. Food is collected every Succoth and Pesach and distributed in the community. After 9/11, a run raised money for victims of the attack.

In addition to the study of classical Jewish texts from the Torah, Navi (Prophets) and Talmud, students learn about and experience Jewish life cycle events and develop an attachment to the land of Israel. Judaic Studies are taught Ivrit B'Ivrit - texts and discussions are conducted in Hebrew. More than 80% of Associated graduates continue into a Jewish high school.

The General Studies programme meets or exceeds the guidelines of the Ontario Ministry of Education and Training. In science and art, there is an emphasis on hands-on activity. Students participate in a science fair, invent toys and create native art. The yearbook and a French newspaper are written and illustrated by students.

Four school counsellors deal with academic, social and personal challenges that are an inevitable part of adolescence. They monitor students' academic progress and, where necessary, make recommendations to teachers and parents. The counsellors, who teach children how to communicate and resolve conflicts, are always available to discuss personal difficulties. Remedial teachers go into class or take students out for extra help. There is an ESL (English as a Second Language) programme to help new immigrant students.

Student council representatives deal with issues like schoolbags in the hallways or too much homework, connecting with fellow students and staff to come up with solutions. "The whole school is like a family," says Judy Cohen, Middle School vice-principal. "Even though the students come from all areas of the city by shuttle bus, they become an integrated community once they get here."

"It's wonderful to see a grade 8 student helping a grade 6 student with schoolwork," says Gail Freeman, head of the Guidance Department. "It's very supportive." To ease the transition from elementary to middle school, an orientation day is held each May. Students are bussed to the new campus where they tour the building, observe classes, and speak with student council members and peer counsellors.

There are over 550 students in grades 6, 7, and 8. For more information on choosing the best education for your child, please call Associated's Admissions and Tuition office: 416-494-7666, ext. 323.

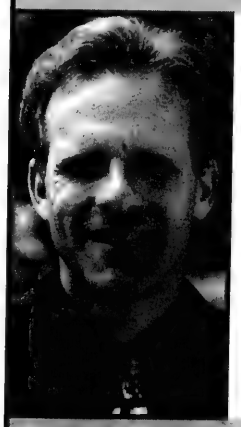
Six Days of War:
June 1967 and the Making of the Modern Middle East



Michael Oren
Mon. June 17, 2002, at 8 p.m.

With its swift and stunning military victory against an Arab coalition led by Egypt in the Six Day War, Israel preserved its existence and redrew the map of the region — with fateful consequences.

The Camp David Accords, the assassinations of Anwar Sadat and Yitzhak Rabin, the first intifada, the failed Oslo Accord and the current crisis, all trace their origins to the Six Day War.

Michael Oren, a Princeton-trained scholar in Middle East history, Senior Fellow at The Shalem Center in Jerusalem and former advisor to the Israeli delegation to the United Nations, will give a gripping account of one of the pivotal events in modern Middle Eastern history.

St. Catharines shul to mark 100 years of services

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Unlike many Canadian small towns, St. Catharines has a Jewish community that is holding its own.

Over the past few years, the "big small town" has experienced a rejuvenation in Jewish communal life, said David Cooperman, a third-generation native.

The community is looking forward to celebrating 100 years of continual communal services on the May 17 weekend with extended Shabbat services featuring New York Cantor Howard Shalowitz at Congregation B'Nei Israel, the city's only synagogue, to be followed by a gala dinner Sunday night.

Jewish settlers began to arrive in the city, located on the Niagara Escarpment between Hamilton and Niagara Falls and near Buffalo, N.Y., in the 1860s.

"But [Jewish communal] services didn't really begin until the early part of the 20th century," Cooperman said.

At that time, David's grandfather, Jacob Cooperman was hired by the community as a ba'al koreh (Torah reader) and Hebrew teacher.

He couldn't support himself in the Torah-reading business, so he eventually found his way to dry goods and furniture, said David's father Bernie, 90.

Bernie remembers growing up in St. Catharines as an experience that encouraged close friendships.

"At that time, the general society was closed to Jews, so by necessity the community did things with each other," Bernie said.

World events affected the city, and St. Catharines experienced growth spurts after the Russian Revolution and the two world wars. Later, Jewish immigrants arrived from as far away as South Africa and from as close as Montreal.

Today, the community has more than 250 families, David said.

In addition, with the recent expansion of Brock University, many Jewish academics have found their way to St. Catharines, he added.

As with all small communities, Jews began to have an effect on the general populace around them as they integrated into their environment, said Michael Grand, director of regional communities for Canadian Jewish Congress.

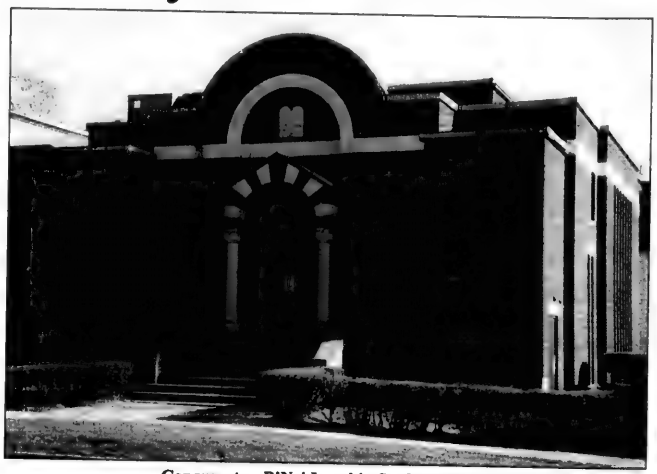
Jewish communities in small towns have always played an important part in bringing relevant issues to every nook of our province, said Grand, a professor of psychology at the University of Guelph.

The community expresses its views on anti-Semitism and Israel as they interact with the people around them, whether they are members of Parliament or the board of education, and give voice to issues that would not otherwise be heard in small towns, Grand explained.

For fourth-generation St. Catharines native Noah Slepkov, 20, growing up in a small town has not been without some difficulties.

Slepkov, a Jewish studies student at York University in Toronto, said he had to explore and learn about his Jewish identity on his own.

His father, Howard, is past president of the synagogue and is actively involved in Jewish community life in St. Catharines.



Congregaton B'Nei Israel in St. Catharines.

Noah has also always been involved in Jewish life, but found that retaining a Jewish identity in a community where a minyan isn't always readily available and kosher meat has to be brought in from elsewhere has been somewhat of a challenge.

"My friends from big cities went to day schools and had their Judaism spoonfed to them," Noah said, adding that "I had to work at being informed on all the issues because they weren't easily accessible."

Eventually, Noah would like to move to Toronto where job opportunities may be better and where he will be able to choose from many different minyans to go to. "I would like to be able to do things like send my children to Jewish day schools or just go down to the corner and get a kosher hamburger," Noah said.

But Noah acknowledged that small-town Jewish living may have contributed to his strong sense of identity.

Grand noted that larger Jewish communities don't really appreciate the many roles that smaller communities play in Canada. Besides teaching about tolerance and diversity through their very presence, it can be a lonely experience to arrive in a town and not be "able to find a Shabbas dinner and a minyan whenever you want it."

The upcoming weekend celebration will feature a display of St. Catharines memorabilia, as well as music and entertainment by Bais Groove. For further information, call 905 685-6767.

Historical analogies often misleading

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Historical analogies can often be as misleading as helpful in understanding contemporary events. But such analogies are appealing and fashionable. One recent trend is to compare the Israel-Palestinian quagmire to the French-Algerian struggle (in which French troops killed approximately one million Arabs between 1954 and 1962). Two recent examples are Andrew Mack's Globe and Mail article Sharon's Algerian shadow (May 7) and Tony Judt's essay in the New York Review of Books titled The Road to Nowhere (May 9).

Mack, a former director of strategic planning for UN Secretary General Kofi Annan, and Judt, a professor of European studies at New York University, argue that unless Israel ceases to be a "colonial" power "oppressing" the Palestinians the way the French exploited the Algerians, it will become an "international pariah."

Both writers lay the blame for the Israeli-Palestinian debacle on Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's shoulders. Both ignore Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's role, long before Sharon was elected, in rejecting former prime minister Ehud Barak's offers to negotiate an end to Israel's "occupation." And, of course, both find the comparisons to the French-Algerian struggle compelling.

The Palestinians and their supporters lap up this analogy. Only once does Mack acknowledge Israel's argument that "Palestinian violence can no more defeat Israel than Algerian violence could have ousted the French from France." But then Mack attempts to counter this argument by claiming that "the goal of the Palestinian mainstream is to force the Israelis from the occupied territories – not from Israel." Crucially, it is this very assumption, which Mack states as fact, that many Israelis, including a large number on the left, reject.

Oddly, Mack admits that "The Palestinian suicide bombers have killed the Israeli peace movement." But he never stops to consider why this might be so. After all, the Israeli peace movement propelled the spirit of Oslo. Now the movement is reacting to what they know is Arafat's betrayal, to what they sense is his desire not just to possess the West Bank and Gaza, but all of Israel too.

The parallels with Algeria are misleading. The Algerians never declared France to be illegitimate, nor did they call for its complete annihilation, as did the Palestine Liberation

Investigations clear security officers in mall flag flap

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A police investigation and an internal probe have turned up no evidence that two Jewish men were subjected to racist statements or were mistreated by security guards at a downtown Ottawa mall, the building manager said last week.

"We don't feel we have the basis to take any further action at this point. The allegations that were made were not supported," said Robert Hasler, general manager of the Rideau Centre.

Hasler said mall personnel, as well as police, screened security camera videotapes, and also spoke to shopkeepers, the individuals involved and bystanders in order to get a sense of what transpired.

None of the evidence supports the allegations, and in fact, it contradicts them, Hasler said.

The incident being investigated took place April 21, shortly after a massive pro-Israel rally on Parliament Hill when two rally participants, Marc Abergel and David Abissidan of Montreal, entered the nearby mall with several friends. Abergel was carrying an Israeli flag.

At Ottawa's Rideau Centre

Abergel and Abissidan said two mall security personnel quickly intervened and told them to remove the flag. What's more, Abergel and Abissidan allege that the mall employees used rude language and were extremely aggressive. Abergel said one security officer pushed him against a wall when he was arrested.

Abissidan was detained when he photographed the incident and the two were detained in a small security room on mall's lower level.

That's where Abergel alleges most of the racist statements were made, with security personnel allegedly calling them "f-----g Jews" and "dirty Jews." Police arrived shortly afterwards and released the pair.

Hasler said video surveillance showed the flag was being held inside the mall and the security guards were enforcing the mall's policy against demonstrations. Security personnel maintained they were polite and never made anti-Semitic statements, Hasler said.

"These allegations are of the most extreme and disturbing kind. As a result, thorough investigations were conducted by officials of Rideau Centre and the Ottawa Police. These investigations have clearly shown the allegations to be unsubstantiated and without any foundation whatsoever... [T]here is no support for allegations that the individuals involved were subjected to improper use of force, unlawfully detained or that comments of a derogatory nature were made," Hasler said in a news release.

The mall received numerous phone calls and e-mails once the incident became public, Hasler said. "We know it has been upsetting to a lot of people in the community. It's been upsetting to us."

The mall "would never tolerate behaviour as alleged," Hasler stated. "We now want to reassure the community and others who have expressed concerns that the security officers acted appropriately."

Hasler said the mall has amended its arrest policies and procedures. Although security officers have the authority to detain trespassers and those involved in criminal activity, in future they will contact police when demonstrations are involved.

Calls to Ottawa Police and Abergel were not returned by The CJN's deadline.

Minister says media spreading 'Palestinian lies'

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — A Pentecostal lay minister here recently blasted the news media for "keeping the pot boiling by spreading Palestinian lies."

"The media keeps bringing forth these lies. They should be more responsible in reporting. Many Christian believers have the same conclusion. We can't listen to the news or we'll be bound to the lie," Bill Styles told members of the Beth Israel Synagogue at a breakfast meeting.

Styles and his wife Gerry, Maritime representatives of the Christian organization Bridges For Peace, both spoke to the congregation.

Bill Styles teaches academic upgrading and water chemistry at Nova Scotia Community College, and heads chemistry and microbiology labs at Saint Mary's University. He is also a staunch supporter of Israel, as is Bridges for Peace, founded in 1979 by the late Dr. Douglas Young, a Bible scholar and evangelical pastor in the United States.

"Gerry and I lived in Israel from 1980 to 1986, where I studied the physical and historical geography of Israel with the American Institute of Holy Land Studies [now Jerusalem University College]," Styles said. "We worked on the itineraries of Christian tour groups with Israeli guides, then became sales reps for a tourism company."

He said Bridges For Peace started when Young became deeply hurt after he discovered that anti-Semitism originated with early church leaders. He wanted the Jewish people to know there were many Christians who didn't, and don't, believe the anti-Semitic teaching.

Bridges For Peace raises funds to operate the first – and largest – food bank in Israel, according to Gerry Styles. Forty tons of food are distributed each month to a clientele ranging from Holocaust survivors to disadvantaged individuals. The organization also distributes Bibles, blankets, welcome baskets and school starter kits for young students, and operates Project Rescue to assist Russian Jews who wish to immigrate to Israel but are having difficulty affording the cost of visas, passports, transportation and lodging.

The Styles are from British Columbia. They are children, Bill said, of non-religious people, but started going to church in 1967, met a Jewish couple in B.C. and decided to visit Israel in 1974 to see the area that represents the roots of three major religions. He decided to move his family there in 1980.

His daughter Lori, now 27, lived in Israel in her elementary school years. Returning to Canada in 1986 at age 12, she returned on a solidarity mission last February. "I was there to show Christians are with the Israelis in their struggles. I went as a tourist this time, but when I arrived in Jerusalem, it felt like I was home," she told the Beth Israel audience.

Bill Styles was critical of Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat. "Israel has done a great deal, given money to the Palestinians, but Arafat has done nothing with it. There are still refugee camps. He has done nothing.

"The Israelis have had so much bad press. It's unbelievable. We must ask God to put His hand on the army, just as He did with King David's army," he added.

"We owe Israel a tremendous debt because of the rats' nest they uncovered in the West Bank and because of uncovering other blocs of terrorism [in 1982]... It's a blessing for us to be part of you and to see what has taken place in Israel. We just wanted to encourage you today [and tell you] that Israel has friends in the Christian faith," Gerry Styles concluded.

Shabbaton planned

VANCOUVER — Adam va-Adamah Environmental Society is holding its annual Wilderness Shabbaton in Elaho Valley from June 7 to 9.

The Shabbaton, held in conjunction with the Witness Program, gives urban Jews an opportunity to experience the beauty of the wilderness region, the effects of logging practices, and the rich traditions of the Squamish Nation, while honouring Shabbat.

Carpools plan to depart from the church parking lot at the corner of Taylor Way and Highway 1 in West Vancouver on June 7 at 3:00 PM, in order to make the four-hour drive and set up in time for Shabbat. The shabbatons ends around noon on Sunday.

Participants bring their own tents, sleeping bags, food and water.

HEARING SOLUTIONS
Sound advice you can trust.

Hearing Solutions, Toronto's largest provider of hearing healthcare, is proud to have been recognized as the Best Hearing Clinic in Toronto by Forever Young magazine and the Etobicoke Guardian, and most recently by the prestigious Consumer Choice Awards.

The full-service clinics provide for all needs under one roof. Unlike going to a doctor's office or visiting some hearing aid retailer, Hearing Solutions is equipped and staffed to allow clients to have their hearing tested at the same place they purchase their hearing aid. In addition to state-of-the-art equipment and the latest technologies in hearing aids, Hearing Solutions staff includes experienced Registered Dispensing Audiologists and Hearing Instrument Practitioners.

The staff at Hearing Solutions involve their clients throughout the entire process of testing and hearing aid evaluation. Clients are educated about their degree of hearing loss and their options so they can make informed decisions. This personal approach has made Hearing Solutions very popular in the Jewish Community. Many happy customers have recommended their service to friends and family. Now, with expanded locations, it's even easier to enjoy the sounds of life again.

You're invited to a presentation on hearing aids.

SIEMENS This month, Siemens, the world's largest hearing aid manufacturer, will be at our clinics, to display, discuss, and speak about the latest hearing aids. (see below for specific date for each location)

Organization (PLO) Charter regarding "the Zionist Entity." And while the French never had any historical attachment to Algeria, there has been a continuing Jewish presence in Judea and Samaria since the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 A.D., disrupted only during the 1948-1967 period when Jews were forbidden by Jordanian law to live there.

Lastly, once the French had left Algeria, the Algerians never insisted that they had a right to France itself. But today, even if Israel were to withdraw unilaterally from the West Bank and Gaza, that would not stop the Palestinians – and foremost Yasser Arafat – from pressing for a "right of return" to Israel, which would mean the end of the Jewish State.

Likud Central Committee rejects Palestinian state

By YOSSI VERTER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon suffered a painful political setback Sunday night at the hands of his rival, former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu, when the Likud Central Committee adopted a resolution completely rejecting the creation of a Palestinian state.

At a raucous meeting in Tel Aviv, Sharon and Netanyahu went head to head over whether the party should vote on the resolution. A proposal by Sharon to postpone the vote was defeated in a secret ballot by 669 (59 per cent) to 465 (41 per cent) votes.

Sharon desperately tried to prevent the vote, arguing it would precipitate international pressure on Israel and tie his hands diplomatically.

"Any decision taken today on the final [status] agreement is dangerous to the state of Israel and will only intensify the pressures on us," Sharon said prior to the vote. His proposal was met with a chorus of boos.

The adoption of the resolution directly contradicts the position expressed several times by Sharon. On two separate occasions last year, he publicly expressed readiness to back the creation of a Palestinian state.

Sharon opened his remarks by criticizing what he called the "naivete" of prior governments in making agreements with Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat.

"I did not shake Arafat's hand," the prime minister said in a swipe at former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu who spoke before him, and who held several meetings with the Palestinian leader during his term in office.

"There can be no peace with terror, with a man of terror," he said. "To make real peace for generations, we must beat the terror. There is no other way."

Sharon also reminded the crowd that a Likud-led government had already participated in a regional peace conference – in Madrid in 1991 – and that Netanyahu was part of the Israeli delegation. That comment came as a result of Netanyahu's criticism of Sharon's idea of a regional peace summit.

Prior to Sharon's remarks, Netanyahu addressed the central committee, calling for Arafat's exile from the territories.

"We have no choice but to exile Arafat," Netanyahu said, referring to the Palestinian leader as "the engine that runs terror."

Netanyahu said that, during his recent visit to the United States, the problem he experienced "was not to explain why Arafat should be exiled, but why we haven't exiled him."

Netanyahu said a Palestinian state with or without Arafat at its head would threaten Israel. He also said Arafat still intends to use a Palestinian state as the first step toward destroying Israel.

The former prime minister had to stop his remarks on several occasions due to disturbances by the crowd. Channel One reported the disturbances were likely orchestrated in advance by the Sharon camp.

Netanyahu said that he supported an entity that would allow Palestinians to govern themselves, but opposed granting them all the rights that come with statehood – such as an army and acquiring weapons – because such a state would threaten Israel.

"Self rule – 'Yes'; state - 'No,'" Netanyahu said.

Foreign Minister Shimon Peres said Monday that the Likud decision ruling out a future Palestinian state was "tragic, tragic to the state of Israel."

Peres told Army Radio he understands "that this is a battle for power, but I am convinced that if Netanyahu is elected, he will be as he was before previous elections, he was in favour of Oslo and he shook Arafat's hand."

Asked whether he believed that if Netanyahu were prime minister, he would agree to the establishment of a Palestinian state, Peres said, "I assume so."

Peres dismissed as "words, words, words devoid of meaning," Netanyahu's vision of self-rule rather than Palestinian independence.

"If they're under our sovereignty, we control their economy, their villages, their lives, their houses, and in any case they'll react as they are reacting. We must not delude ourselves. All in all, verbal therapy is an extraordinary thing, but we're too old for this."

Peres said the coalition government's policy guidelines effectively gave the nod to a Palestinian state, by backing a deal according to UN resolutions 242 and 338, which speak of return of territories captured in 1967.

He confirmed he met Palestinian Mohammad Rashid, Arafat's financial adviser, in Rome last week. He said Sharon knew of the meeting, which was one of the elements Netanyahu criticized as an example of the government's failure to root out and destroy the PA.

Peres said Rashid and other Palestinian leaders agreed that, in the context of reforms Israel is demanding of the PA, there should be only one PA security apparatus, rather than the dozens in existence at present.

Saudis putting on the pressure to stop suicide attacks

By DANIEL SOBELMAN and SHLOMO SHAMIR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Arab-language daily Al-Quds al-Aravi reported last weekend that Saudi Arabia intends to summon senior Hamas and Islamic Jihad activists to Riyadh, as part of its efforts to calm the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

According to a senior Israeli diplomatic source, Saudi Arabia has begun to act on its promise to rein in Hamas and Islamic Jihad. Information in Israel's possession suggests that Saudi foreign minister Saud al-Faisal applied pressure on Palestinian Authority minister Nabil Sha'ath, during Friday's meeting of Arab foreign ministers in Cairo, in order to bring about an end to the suicide attacks that Saudi Arabia believes pose a threat to the recent fragile quiet.

While Israeli sources say it is too early to know whether there have been direct meetings between Saudi officials and representatives of the two organizations, reports have reached Israel of "various types of [Saudi] pressure," aimed at kick-starting the diplomatic process.

On Saturday, the leaders of Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Syria held a summit at the Red Sea resort of Sharm el Sheikh. At the summit, which went on until the small hours, Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and Saudi Arabia's de facto ruler, Crown Prince Abdullah, tried to exert their influence on Syrian President Bashar Assad to bring about a regional accord, as well as a continued lessening of tensions between Israel and the Palestinians.

One of the participants in the meeting at Sharm el Sheikh was the head of the Palestinian preventive security apparatus in the West Bank, Mohammed Dahlan.

The summit ended with a condemnation of violence in all its manifestations and a joint call for Arab states to back the Saudi peace initiative passed at the Arab League summit in Beirut at the end of March.

It is believed Saudi officials also entreated Dahlan to do his best to prevent terror attacks against Israeli civilian targets.

A senior Hamas activist in the Gaza Strip, Abed al-Aziz Rantisi, denied Sunday that Saudi Arabia had been in contact with the organization. He added that Hamas operations against Israeli targets would continue for as long as the occupation continued.

In related developments Saudi Foreign Minister Prince Saud al-Faisal defended the distribution of funds by his government to Palestinians. Some 1,800 Palestinian families, including the families of suicide bombers, are currently receiving financial aid from Saudi Arabia, according to al-Faisal in an interview published in the latest edition of Time magazine.

He denounced the charge that Saudi money encourages other Palestinians to become suicide bombers. "Does this money, when it goes to the families of the suicide bombers, tell another boy or girl, 'Go kill yourselves, and we will give your family money'? This is ridiculous."

Israel sank arms ship bound for Gaza Strip: Report

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel last week sank a ship off the Gaza Strip coast that was carrying weapons intended for the Palestinians, the New York Post reported Sunday.

The report said the arms cargo had been supplied by Hezbollah.

The Post story was written by Uri Dan, who is considered to be a close associate of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon. Security sources in Israel claimed to have no knowledge of the incident.

Attempts by the Palestinians to smuggle weapons stopped temporarily following the Israel Defence Forces capture of the ship Karine A, in January. But the Palestinian Authority has stepped up smuggling efforts following the IDF's seizure of vast arms during Operation Defensive Shield in the West Bank last month.

In May last year, the IDF also intercepted the Santorini, a fishing vessel that was carrying a cargo of arms bound for the Palestinians.

The Saudi dossier

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

When Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's entourage arrived in Washington last week, one member of the group, MK Limor Livnat, handed out a comprehensive report that included documents seized by the IDF during Operation Defensive Shield, which she claimed proved Saudi Arabia was providing financial backing for Palestinian terror.

Comment

The 85-page report raised several eyebrows in the American capital, with some American journalists wondering out loud what the point was of proving the Saudis supported the families of Palestinian victims, especially since Saudi Arabia has admitted this in public.

It is possible, however, that the Saudi authorities are not comfortable with their support of the Palestinians being thrown into the spotlight. This is an assumption that is backed, for example, by the publication of a document, sent by the Saudi Committee for the Support of the Al-Quds Intifadah to Azam al-Hadar, who is responsible for aiding Palestinian security officers injured during the intifadah.

Several days before the document was faxed to Al-Hadar on Feb. 18, the official Palestinian newspaper, Al-Hiyat al-Jedida published an announcement that al-Hadar's organization was working together with the Saudi committee, and that families of the victims could receive financial aid from branches of the Arab Bank.

In its fax to Al-Hadar, the committee pointed out that no announcement bearing its name should be published without prior official permission. The fax was signed by the general secretary of the committee, Dr. Walid Ben Abed al-Razaq al-Dali.

That said, the question asked by American journalists is somewhat justified by the fact that the Saudi committee is far from being a secret organization. On Nov. 30, 2001, for example, the official Saudi news agency published an annual summary of the aid given to the Palestinians in the previous year – around $48 million (US).

Another example: Some 12 months earlier, on Nov. 14, 2000, the Saudi news agency reported that the Saudi interior minister had ordered the payment of around $5,000 "to the families of each of the Palestinian victims, as immediate aid to the Palestinian victims." The vagueness of this statement stems from the use of the word "victims" – "martyrs" in the original Arabic. The word "victim" could apply equally to an unarmed Palestinian civilian, a member of the Palestinian security force, or even a suicide bomber inside Israel.

These two examples are mentioned in Livnat's report, but Israel's primary claim in the "Saudi dossier" is one of principle: Any financial aid increases "the motivation to carry out terror attacks, including suicide bombings."

According to those who compiled the dossier, the financial support provided by Saudi Arabia to the family of a "dead terrorist" is equal to the total salary that the family could earn over a six-year period. And as far as financial support of the Palestinians is concerned, the report emphasizes, Saudi Arabia is second only to Iraq.

Those who compiled the report, which includes 13 appendices of photocopied and translated documents, attempted to show that the money transferred by Saudi Arabia for humanitarian purposes ended up in the Hamas coffers. To this end, they produced a document, signed by an officer in the Palestinian anti-espionage unit, which was sent to Col. Jibril al-Bakh-ri, commander of operations in the Palestinian counterintelligence unit in Bethlehem.

In the document, dated Feb. 10, 2001, the author points out that Saudi Arabia transferred funds to aid Palestinians being held in Israeli prisons. "Saudi Arabia refused to give this money to the Palestinian Authority [PA], fearing it would not reach the prisoners... The money eventually reached the brothers in Hamas, who hid it. Hamas only paid money to its leaders and confiscated the rest of the money."

Livnat's Saudi file also shows how PA Chairman Yasser Arafat was livid at the fact that the Saudi aid was being paid directly to Hamas, rather than to the PA and Fatah.

One appendix includes a collection of media articles transferred to Arafat on Jan. 7, 2001, in which it was reported that $33 million (US) was transferred to the families of Palestinian victims. At the bottom of the page, in handwriting that Israeli intelligence officers identified as Arafat's, the chairman asks Saudi representative Mustafa Div "to tell me where this money went and who received it, since the families of the martyrs and the injured did not see a single penny."

U.S. officials said last week that, together with Israeli experts, they intend to study the documents provided by Livnat. Undersecretary of State Mark Grossman confirmed Israel had provided the United States with documents relating to Saudi involvement in funding terror, but refrained from commenting on the contents of the file. Instead, he repeated the usual U.S. mantra about Saudi support of the United States' war on terror and the importance of Prince Abdullah's peace proposal.

May 6

• A Palestinian woman and three children were shot and killed Sunday on the West Bank by Israel Defense Forces troops. The IDF subsequently issued a statement expressing regret for the "harm to innocent" civilians.

May 7

• At least 15 people were killed and 57 wounded when a suicide/homicide bomber blew himself up at a pool hall in Rishon Letzion.

May 8

• A suicide/homicide bomber injured himself in a failed bombing attempt at the Megiddo junction, a few miles from Jenin. Police said that the attacker was alive and seriously wounded, and had struggled against a sapper robot that dragged him from the roadside into the centre of the highway.

May 9

• An agreement was reached to end the standoff at the Church of the Nativity in Bethlehem. The 13 Palestinians wanted by Israel were dispursed among several European countries.

May 10

• Jerusalem district police and the Shin Bet security service detained four Jews on suspicion of planning mass terror attacks against Palestinian residents of A-Tur and in East Jerusalem. Two of those detained were also arrested about two weeks ago.

• Four people were lightly injured when two Palestinians detonated an explosive device near a branch of Bank Hapoalim in the Old City of Be'er Sheva. By-standers apprehended and beat one of the assailants, who was later taken to hospital for treatment, while local police caught the second terrorist several kilometres outside the city.

British Jews rally for Israel

By YAKIR ZUR
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — British Jewry has marshalled one of its largest crowds ever to show support for Israel.

Some 50,000 demonstrators from all over Britain filled Trafalgar Square on last Monday afternoon, carrying Israeli and British flags and banners reading "Yes to peace, no to terror" and "Suicide bombers kill people and the peace."

A small but noisy pro-Palestinian demonstration was held nearby, carrying banners supporting the intifadah and denouncing the "Zionist state." Two people at the counter-demonstration, which drew about 300 people, were arrested for public order infractions.

Thousands of police officers patrolled the square and neighbouring streets to prevent clashes between pro-Israeli and pro-Palestinian demonstrators, but apart from a little pushing and shoving, the rally ended without incident.

Former Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, the main speaker, said Israel should not allow Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat to head a state because it would be a terrorist state, not a peaceful one.

He also compared the British stand against the Nazis in World War II and Israel's struggle for survival.

> Some 50,000 demonstrators from all over Britain

Were it not for Britain's resistance, the course of history might have been very different, Netanyahu said.

"But now Britain stands before another road, and it must choose between two opposing paths – the path of appeasing terror or the path of confronting terror," he said.

Netanyahu also called on the international community to support Israel.

"Israel is determined to fight," he said. "The question isn't whether Israel will fight, but whether we will fight alone."

A number of high-profile speakers addressed the rally, including Labour Party legislator Peter Mandelson, British Conservative party Deputy Leader Michael Ancram and British Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks.

Sacks said the turnout was the greatest gathering in the history of British Jewry.

"It is important that Israel knows that it's not alone," he said in his speech.

Mandelson, formerly the cabinet secretary for Northern Ireland, said a solution to the Israeli-Palestinian dispute could not be imposed from outside, but could only be reached through negotiations between the two sides.

"Violence and terror will only delay and obstruct the just outcome they seek," he said. "Politics, not violence, secures people's lives."

Mandelson added that a vision of peace benefiting all had sustained the peace process for years.

"In the Middle East, this vision is of an Israel secure within its borders, its existence unchallenged, its people never with their bags packed, never prepared to run again," he said.

"And it is the equivalent for the Palestinian people – a viable, independent state, one that brings not just freedom but responsibility too, fulfilling all the obligations of international law."

Approximately 350 buses brought tens of thousands of Jews from all over Britain, including thousands of students and members of youth groups. The equivalent of hundreds of thousands of dollars were collected, mainly from the budgets of the United Jewish Israel Appeal, the Jewish Agency for Israel and the Jewish National Fund in England, as well as from private contributions.

A small number of Jewish peace activists, including groups called Just Peace and Jews for Justice to Palestine, staged a small vigil opposing the main rally.

Peace Now boycotted the rally, saying it was a show piece to support the policies of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

Ex-Nazi faces trial; prosecutor promises more to come

By TOBY AXELROD
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BERLIN — Proceedings began last week in Germany against a former Nazi SS officer charged with committing war crimes 58 years ago in Italy.

The trial of Friedrich Engel, 92, began May 7 in Hamburg. Among the charges, he is accused of having given orders to kill 59 prisoners in the Marassi Prison in Genoa in May 1944. The killings came as retribution for an attack partisans launched days earlier on German soldiers.

According to eyewitness reports, on May 19, 1944, the prisoners were bound together in pairs and forced to stand on wooden planks over a pit that Jewish inmates had been forced to dig.

The condemned waited their turn to die, as pair after pair was shot and fell on top of those killed before.

Engel, who has been living in Hamburg for decades and was sentenced in absentia to life in prison in 1999 by an Italian military court, has denied giving or approving the orders for the shooting.

"It was a matter of following orders," he was quoted as saying.

He also said those orders had been in keeping with international law, and added that the victims suffered an "easy death."

Chief Prosecutor Kurt Schrimm told the Suddeutsche Zeitung newspaper that such trials make sense even though the accused have become old and frail.

"We are showing the victims, and their relatives, that to us their fate is important," said Schrimm, who heads the Central Office for the Resolution of National Socialist War Crimes.

"And we are showing our society that no one who committed such terrible crimes can simply shrug off their guilt and responsibility."

Engel previously has rejected other charges lodged against him by Italian courts.

Among those charges, he was accused of participating in wartime atrocities in the Genoa area – including the shooting of 147 people near a Benedictine cloister and the shooting of 18 hostages in a village.

Hamburg state prosecutors had filed charges against Engel and several other accused war criminals in the 1960s, but the proceedings were suspended.

Engel's case was reopened in 1999.

His trial likely will not be the last war crimes case to come before a German court, according to Nazi-hunter Schrimm, who says some 20 other cases are being prepared.

For example, he says, his office is investigating a case involving the execution of 500 women, children and elderly in Italy's Tuscany region in August 1944.

Schrimm expects another Hamburg resident to face charges in that case.

He told Suddeutsche Zeitung that Germany had lifted the statute of limitations on Nazi war crimes in 1979 so that perpetrators "could not run free without fear of being brought to justice."

Schrimm and a colleague recently found documents in the Central Intelligence Agency's archives in Washington, D.C., that included interviews with eyewitnesses and perpetrators.

"There is also a wealth of new information available from eastern European sources," Schrimm said. "Our work is far from over."

Report on Muslim anti-Semitism 'bone-chilling'

By SHARON SAMBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON, D.C. — "Bone-chilling" and "hair-raising" are usually terms reserved for horror movies, not research reports.

But those words are being used to describe a new report on Muslim anti-Semitism published by the American Jewish Committee (AJC).

AJC officials hope the hate literature rampant in the Arab world no will longer be glossed over, but will become an issue to be acknowledged and confronted.

"We must not let such warnings go unheeded," said David Harris, the AJC's executive director.

For much of the past year, American Jewish groups have been warning of the virulent strain of Muslim anti-Semitism, particularly since the Sept. 11 terror attacks, which many in the Arab and Muslim world blame on Israel.

Many contend the worldwide spike in anti-Semitism, including a rise in attacks against European Jews and Jewish institutions, is the worst in decades.

But the AJC report says special attention must be paid to Muslim anti-Semitism, because of its ferocity and its capacity to complicate already difficult peace efforts in the Middle East.

In Muslim Anti-Semitism: A Clear and Present Danger, Prof. Robert Wistrich of Hebrew University writes that the anti-Semitism in the Arab world's press and governments "has taken root in the body politic of Islam to an unprecedented degree."

Already present for a number of years, Arab anti-Semitism has become more widespread, intensive and radicalized, Wistrich said at a press conference in Washington, D.C., last week.

In his view, Arab anti-Semitism is the "single biggest impediment to peace in the Middle East," and attempts to ignore it will boomerang, Wistrich warned.

It is a mistake to see the current wave of anti-Semitism as a by-product of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Wistrich said.

Components of classical European anti-Semitism – slogans, images, stereotypes and conspiracy theories against Jews – have now been incorporated into Arab anti-Semitism.

The contents of Muslim anti-Semitism often defy logic. Even as many Arab governments or media deny the Holocaust, they compare Israel to Nazi Germany because of its treatment of Palestinians, trying to "Nazify" Zionism, Wistrich said.

Wistrich is not the only scholar to sound the alarm. Daniel Pipes, director of the Middle East Forum, a Philadelphia-based think tank, says Muslim anti-Semitism is part of a larger picture.

"It is a mistake to look at terrorism in isolation and it is a mistake to look at anti-Semitism in isolation," Pipes said. "They are part of a totalitarian ideology of militant Islam."

The Middle East Media Research Institute (MEMRI), which translates Arab media reports, has been tracking Arab anti-Semitism and incitement.

While much of the rhetoric is not new, the Internet allows the message of hate to be spread more quickly, according to Steve Stalinsky, MEMRI's executive director.

Since completing the research for the AJC report a few months ago, Wistrich has seen no sign of improvement. Arab officials have heaped praise on suicide bombers, and a Palestinian official has charged that Jews killed Jesus.

> 'Warning must not go unheeded'

Such accusations, blood libels and other charges are made against Jews and Israelis not just in Iraq, Iran and other terrorist-supporting countries. Even supposedly moderate Arab countries like Egypt are "just as bad" when it comes to spreading hate, Wistrich said.

Jewish groups have raised the issue of Arab anti-Semitism with the Bush administration. The White House has responded with words of condemnation, but nothing more.

The Anti-Defamation League, a vocal critic of anti-Semitism in the Egyptian media, was left out of a meeting in Washington, D.C., in March that Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak called with Jewish groups.

ADL has called attention to the upsurge of Arab anti-Semitism, saying that if it is allowed to grow it could become "one of the most destructive forces unleashed in this new century."

The AJC report traces the evolution of anti-Semitism in the Islamic world and looks at the "culture of hatred" that extends to schools and mosques. The basic message in such places is that Jews are a "hateful, loathsome people" intent on taking over the world and destroying Muslim society.

Wistrich also notes that the term anti-Semitism refers exclusively to hatred of Jews. The semantic game used by some Arabs – that they cannot be considered anti-Semitic because they are also Semites – is "absurd," he said.

Stem cell research yields surprising conclusions

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — They're microscopic, but capturing headlines worldwide. Stem cells are central to everything health-related, from cloning to miracle cures.

The subject was on the agenda at the lunch session of the third annual Conference on Jewish Medical Ethics, held April 28 at Beth Jacob V'Anshe Drildz, where Rabbi Edward Reichman, also a medical doctor, spoke on the topic Stem Cell Research: Medical Miracle and/or Moral Meltdown?

Although people of all ages have stem cells, the current controversy surrounding stem cell research revolves around embryonic stem cells, retrieved just a few days after a human ovum (egg) is fertilized, said Rabbi Reichman of the Albert Einstein College of Medicine (Yeshiva University).

At this early stage, cells are undifferentiated: each one, he said, "could become a skin cell, a kidney cell, a liver cell, a brain cell… only by the direction of HaShem [God]… will [it] grow into the intended organ system." This adaptability gives researchers hope that stem cells may hide cures for diseases such as Parkinson's, Tay-Sachs and cancer.

However, to retrieve those "few magical, potent cells," Rabbi Reichman said, "one has to literally dismantle the embryo." This is the heart of the dilemma. "Is… the fertilized embryo," he asked, "grown just a few days, equivalent to human life – such that harvesting those stem cells is tantamount to homicide?"

While Catholic authorities argue that stem cells constitute a "human being," Halachah (Jewish law) says that rather than life beginning when egg meets sperm, the fetus passes through several developmental stages, culminating when it exits the birth canal, Rabbi Reichman said.

Since stem cells are harvested just a few days after fertilization, the main question is not whether the embryo constitutes human life, but whether it is considered potential life.

According to the Talmud, a fetus of less than 40 days is "mere water." Yet even at that early stage, Rabbi Reichman said, one can violate Shabbat to preserve it because the embryo represents potential life.

Here Rabbi Reichman introduced another variable. Jewish sources, he said, only mention this potential for embryos in utero. Since stem cells are harvested from embryos in vitro, they may have a lesser status.

Rabbi Reichman pointed out that the prohibition in Genesis 9:6, usually taken as "whoever sheds man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed," uses the Hebrew b'adam, which can also give a meaning of "whoever sheds the blood of a man within a man" – in other words, in utero. "A man within a petri dish," he said, is an entirely different matter.

In Halachah, the distinction between uterus and petri dish is crucial. Within the body, an embryo will very likely develop into a human being. "Such is not the case," said Rabbi Reichman, "with a fertilized egg sitting in the laboratory." Fulfilling its potential requires "very serious intervention" – careful storage, painstaking implantation.

According to most rabbis, then, the ethics of abortion don't apply here. While a fertilized ovum has more value than mere "sloughed-off skin cells… at the same time, it is not accorded the status of a fetus in utero." And since even a fetus in utero is not considered fully human, a laboratory embryo could certainly not be described as "human life."

Rabbi Reichman also pointed out that microscopic things have "no halachic weight" – for example, our drinking water often contains thousands of swarming "creatures" that would be non-kosher if visible. He suggested that embryonic stem cells might even fall into this category, which would allow for even further leniencies.

Rabbinic authorities, Rabbi Reichman said, have ruled overwhelmingly to permit stem cell research. Rabbi Levi Halperin, the director of the Institute for Science and Halachah, has even suggested – as a corollary to a stringency prohibiting wasting sperm – that there might be an obligation to donate "extra" embryos (following procedures to conceive a child) to medical research, since this avoids "waste" by potentially saving lives.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I am wondering which oil has the least fat, and whether light oils are really light.

A. All oil is 100 per cent fat, containing approximately 14 grams of fat and 115 calories per tablespoon. The difference is that light oils are only light in flavour or colour, not fat.

Q. I recently asked in a restaurant not to have any oil added to my grilled vegetable appetizer. The waiter argued that the oil they used was pure extra-virgin olive oil and that it was OK. Is this true for someone who is dieting?

A. No, it is not. No matter how good the quality is, it is still 100 per cent fat. Tell the waiter you are impressed that they use high quality ingredients and ask them to leave it off anyway. While olive oil is a heart-healthy fat, it is still very high in fat and calories if you are trying to lose weight.

Q. I have an 18-month-old who does not really like milk. How much milk should a child this age consume?

A. Two cups or 16 ounces per day are enough at this age. Remember, if your child doesn't like plain milk, he or she can get lots of calcium from yogurt, cheese or even chocolate milk. Calcium enriched orange juice is another excellent source for those who don't like or can't tolerate dairy products.

The story behind the Feldbergs' collection of self-portraits

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Feldberg Collection: Self-Portraits from 1920s Berlin is a notable legacy recalling turbulent times, subterfuge and secrecy.

On show at the Justina M. Barnicke Gallery in Hart House, University of Toronto, May 23 to June 20, the portraits were accumulated by Hilde and Siegbert Feldberg, who at the outset could not have anticipated the collection's future significance. This exhibition will mark the first time the collection is on public view outside Germany. Hart House is its exclusive Canadian venue; from there it goes to Boston.

Hilde Feldberg with her two boys Hans and Heinz.

Born in Stettin, in north-east Germany, Hilde, an accomplished pianist, and her husband Siegbert, a lawyer who went into the family's clothing business, were discerning collectors and close friends of many Berlin-based avant-garde poets and artists, including such painters as Kathe Kollwitz, Max Liebermann and Josef Oppenheimer. During visits to Berlin, they indulged their numerous cultural interests.

In the aftermath of World War I when most Germans were experiencing grinding hardship, Siegbert provided impoverished artist friends with custom-made suits in exchange for self-portraits. He also financed theatre productions and granted loans to business partners without pressing for repayment.

With the rise of Hitler and the Nazis' organized boycott of Jewish businesses, banks, doctors and lawyers in April 1933, Siegbert immigrated to India, where he planned to open a textile factory. When his prospective partner reneged, he found employment as chief sales representative in India for the Austrian car manufacturer, Steyr-Fuchs.

Hilde remained in Stettin with their two young sons Hans and Heinz, to liquidate their property, later moving to Berlin. Kristallnacht and then a phone warning from a former Feldberg porter who was working in the registration office of the Berlin police, prompted her to join her husband as quickly as possible. Emigration laws compelled her to leave behind all valuables except her baby grand piano and a box specifically constructed to shelter the portraits.

Aboard a train to Genoa, Hilde shared a compartment with a Nazi official who noted what fine "Hitler boys" her fair haired sons could become. She kept him involved in such animated conversation that he waved off officers checking passports.

In India, she was hired as a receptionist at Sir Victor Sassoon's photo studios and as a musician with All India Radio in Bombay. The Feldbergs resumed a bourgeois lifestyle, though on a lesser scale than in Berlin. They also enrolled their sons in British boarding schools.

Following the declaration of war in September 1939, Siegbert was interned as an enemy alien. About a year later, he was released with 561 Germans, mainly Jewish refugees. He served in the British army for five years and he and Hilde became British nationals.

Hilde's relatives were not so fortunate. In 1940, Stettin's 800 Jewish families were deported to Poland. Her father died en route and the others were eventually sent to concentration camps or massacred by the Gestapo. Air raids and Russian shelling decimated Stettin in 1945. Today the city, known as Szczecin, is part of Poland.

The Feldbergs moved again in 1949 to newly independent Pakistan, returned to Germany in 1963 to assess restitution claims and in 1966, settled in Lugano, Switzerland. During a 1971 vacation to attend concerts and plays in Berlin, Siegbert died of a heart attack in Heidelberg.

He had written to a friend saying he hoped the self-portraits, "preserved through all the difficulties, will one day find a dignified home in a museum in either East or West Berlin."

In 1976, after selling the major part of the collection to the Berlinische Galerie, Hilde, almost 90, relocated to Edmonton to be near her son Heinz. Living in a retirement home but still effervescent, she studied tai-chi, took an interest in Canadian politics and played her grand piano, which like its owner, was well-travelled.

The Justina M. Barnicke exhibition comes to the gallery through the efforts of U of T's University College principal Paul Perron, who learned the Feldbergs' story from their granddaughter, historian Gina Feldberg. U of T professor Pia Kleber was able to unearth the self-portraits in the archives of the Berlinische Galerie, whose curator, Freye Mulhaupt, is lending them for travel and display.

Woody Allen film burdened with a sense of deja vu

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Woody Allen has been churning out films at the frantic rate of one a year for the past few years.

So it is hardly surprising that his most recent movies have been disappointingly stale, compared to masterpieces like Annie Hall and Manhattan, which dazzled us in the late 1970s.

This is a great pity, since the man is a major talent who has rightly earned his place in the pantheon of American cinema.

His latest offering, Hollywood Ending, now playing at the Cineplex chain, does not break the mould.

The story is set in the centre of New York City, his favourite set. The chief protagonist, a Jewish filmmaker who's given one last chance to redeem his floundering career, is thoroughly neurotic, a schlemiel like so many of his previous characters. The film, propelled by a generally self-assured ensemble cast, is studded with jokey, sometimes absurd situations.

On the surface, then, Hollywood Ending possesses all the hallmarks of a quintessential Allen movie. But appearances are deceiving.

Although it hums along with Allen's familiar electric energy and inimitable levity, at least some of the time, Hollywood Ending is simply too predictable in tone and substance. It is burdened with a sense of deja vu.

ART EXHIBIT AT CHINESE CULTURAL CENTRE CELEBRATES SHANGHAI'S ROLE AS REFUGE FOR JEWS

Between 1937 and 1941, over 20,000 Jews found refuge in Shanghai, China, at a time when many other countries refused Jewish refugees, ultimately denying them a chance of survival.

An art exhibit reflecting the theme of Chinese compassion for Jews during the Holocaust opens this month in Toronto. A Gift of Friendship Tribute Exhibit features works specially created by 18 Jewish and nine Chinese artists, all Canadian residents. Artists include Beverley Abramson, Al Green, Edith Kernerman, Ann Lazare-Mirvish, Charles Pachter, Rochelle Rubenstein and Judy Singer.

The exhibit was co-ordinated by ORT Toronto co-chairs Ian Leventhal and Harriet Morton, in partnership with honorary co-chairs Renee Bleeman Bernbaum, Peter Kellner and Dr. Ming-Tat Cheung. Honorary patrons are Senator Vivienne Poy, Israeli consul general Meir Romem and Toronto Mayor Mel Lastman.

A Gift of Friendship is on view from May 30 to June 12 at the Chinese Cultural Centre of Greater Toronto, 5183 Sheppard Ave. E., at Progress Road in Scarborough. Admission is free. Afterwards, it goes on permanent display in Ohel Moshe Synagogue, Shanghai.

Broadway Bound: As reported recently in the Toronto Star and the New York Times, former Livent theatre impresario Garth Drabinsky is planning to stage his own Broadway comeback next year through a revival of the British drama The Dresser.

Although he does not intend to set foot in the United States, where he is wanted on charges of criminal fraud, Drabinsky told the Times in a telephone interview, "My intention is not to wither and die but to keep working."

He explained that he expected The Dresser to reach New York next spring after playing several weeks at the Elgin Theatre in Toronto, and that he would not invest personally in the production so as to prevent any potential seizure of assets. Starting with a production of Athol Fugard's play The Island last year in Toronto, the 52-year-old Torontonian "has been inching his way back to the stage," the Times noted.

While keeping busy with special marketing projects for the National Post, the Toronto Argonauts and Muskoka Sands luxury resort and condos, Drabinsky acknowledged that the thrill of live entertainment still pulsed strongly in his blood. "I'm very excited," he said. "I've never stopped thinking about the theatre."

Hollywood Ending predictable in tone and substance

Val Waxman (Allen), a seasoned director, has seen better days. As the film opens, he is finishing a deodorant commercial in Canada's far north, eager to return to the comforts of New York City. Allen, unfairly, takes this opportunity to knock Toronto.

Out of the blue, Ellie (Tea Leoni), Waxman's former wife, comes to his rescue. An executive in a Hollywood film studio, she still believes in him, and persuades her boss and fiance, Hal Yeager (Treat Williams), to hire Waxman for their next project.

As Waxman prepares for his comeback, he comes down with a bout of blindness. Fearing he will be fired, he and his agent hush up his infirmity.

Needless to say, the incoherent rushes do not impress the powers that-be. What else can be expected of a blind director?

The humour turning on Waxman's pathetic efforts to conceal his disability can be funny. But after a while, this conceit grates on the nerves, as does Allen's tired and hackneyed portrayal of yet another nervous Jewish schlemiel.

Indeed, one has the sinking feeling that Allen is running out of fresh, edgy material.

And the dialogue, written by Allen himself, is not as clever as it once was. In a scene with his estranged son, a punk rocker, Waxman offers him an "olive branch." To which his son replies, more or less: "What is this, the Israeli parliament?"

Williams is pretty much convincing as the ruthless studio czar, but Leoni fails to make much of an impression as Waxman's saviour. Debra Messing, who plays Waxman's ditsy wind-up-doll girlfriend, is considerably better. George Hamilton, the perennially-tanned thespian, is persuasive as Yeager's crass associate.

Much to its credit, Hollywood Ending pokes sardonic fun at Hollywood conventions and at pretentious French film critics. But these delicious lines cannot save this movie from itself.

It is clearly time for Allen to regroup.

Speed-the-Plow falls short – but with panache

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Theatre that revolves around a Hollywood cliche can become tiresome and unoriginal, but at least David Mamet's Speed-the-Plow falls into the trap with style.

Centering on two producers with a money-making idea and a manipulative secretary with her own Hollywood script, Speed-the-Plow, playing until May 17 at the Jane Mallett Theatre, is a glimpse into the bleakest moral vacuum.

Pop singer Phil Collins' daughter Joely makes her Toronto stage debut as Karen, the shy but determined temp with a passion to produce. But the conflict of the play revolves around the two producers Bob Gould (Jeff Seymour) and Charlie Fox (Bill Elliot), who come to blows over whether to make another soulless blockbuster or an uncommercial flick that might not rake in the summer movie dollars.

Just as the bigwigs battle over which film will put tushes in the seats, the play has its own possibilities to consider: will it be a fresh and innovative look into the Hollywood production process or a brainless copycat of Hollywood satires such as the films State and Main (a Mamet script) and Get Shorty?

Three-quarters of Speed-The-Plow feels like the latter, yet strong dialogue and a memorable performance from Seymour (who also directs) give the play enough substance to make it a passable two hours.

Known for his dialogue, playwright Mamet keeps it snappy in every scene. He is no stranger to the craft of con-man banter, or to the Hollywood game. His scripts, such as American Buffalo and the Oscar nominated The Verdict, are routinely made into films that focus more on conversation than action.

As he accomplished with Glengarry Glen Ross, Mamet stamps Speed-the-Plow with his familiar trademark: men with a penchant for bullying, trickery and four-letter words. Characters often interrupt each other mid-sentence, and the exchanges reflect the high tension involved with multi-million-dollar banter.

When Fox and Gould team up to produce a violent prison movie starring an A-list actor, the mood in the office couldn't be more slick and phony. The constant handshakes and compliments set the scene for the beautiful temp to disrupt the friendship with plans of her own. But Collins plays the part with a quietness that should have been replaced with fearless integrity, an element that becomes essential to her character's strong will.

Whether it's due to the over-the-top violence or the old sex-equals-power saw, the plot falls short when it comes to introspective drama. And if theatre is meant to entertain and offer some insight into the human condition, then Speed-The-Plow only fulfils the first criterion, albeit with panache.

One performance stands out. Even though Gould is a clone of virtually every other Hollywood producer portrayed in film or theatre (is it too original to create an artistic producer?), Seymour throws himself into the role. His convincing body language and clipped sentences hint at the actor's breadth and experience – Seymour has been acting and directing for more than 20 years in Vancouver and Los Angeles, where he ran the successful Gnu Theatre.

When Fox berates Gould for choosing to green-light an obscure film, he screams: "Your name is gonna be a punchline in this town!" If Mamet doesn't focus more on writing about original themes rather than concentrating on dazzling dialogue, his name could also become a punchline in the town of which his character speaks.

VisionTV spotlight on Islam

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Islam, the world's fastest-growing religion, has been in the harsh glare of the spotlight since last September's unprecedented terrorist events in the United States.

Ever since 19 Muslim hijackers, nearly all Saudi nationals, deliberately crashed commercial airliners into the World Trade Center in Manhattan and the Pentagon in Washington, D.C., claiming nearly 3,000 victims, Islam has been the subject of countless debates.

The questions pundits and intellectuals have posed about the relationship between the identity of the hijackers and their religion may never be fully answered. Yet the quest for understanding is certainly worth the journey.

On May 23, at 9 p.m and again at 11 pm, Vision TV plans to launch Mohammed, a weekly five-part series on the life and teachings of Islam's founder, Mohammed the prophet. Each episode is one hour in length.

Mohammed's story, and the light it sheds on Islam, which commands the loyalty of one billion Muslims around the globe, is largely told through the medium of interviews with people of all stripes, from ordinary folk to scholars.

The interviews are supplemented by sweeping vistas of soaring mosques and majestic desert landscape.

The documentaries, which are measured in tone, describe his early years and the complex political, social and economic environment in which he lived.

They also chronicle his contacts with Judaism and Christianity, his revelation and efforts to spread the new faith, his persecution and flight to Medina, and his final years.

There are several references to Jews and Judaism in the series, a co-Canadian-French production.

Mohammed, who tried but failed to convert the Jews of Arabia, took a Jewish woman, Aisha, as his second wife. A captive who fell into the hands of Mohammed's soldiers, she played a role in the formation of Islam.

We also learn that Mohammed's pragmatism prompted him to tax rather than to banish the Jewish inhabitants of a city his army had conquered, and that the prohibition against the consumption of pork in Islam was derived from Judaism.

Mohammed gives viewers a rounded picture of Islam, but it's debatable whether it explains the connection between Islam and terrorism, if indeed there is one, and the terrifying rage of some of its adherents.

Local jazz singer's CD marks state of her career

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

TORONTO — It's not easy making a living singing. It's even tougher if you happen to sing traditional jazz standards instead of mainstream pop songs.

Toronto jazz singer Leah State, 27, knows this, but she is determined to persevere despite the odds. She recently released her first CD Still, a collection of 10 jazz and show-tune standards, in an attempt to get more people to hear her.

"It's hard when you're Leah State and not Ute Lemper," she admits. "It's a pretty big mountain and I'm not even at the bottom. Sometimes I feel like I'm still on the road that leads to the path that leads to the bottom of the mountain."

The CD also serves as a personal testament to the songs she started singing professionally in Toronto clubs three years ago. The songs are quite diverse. They include Irving Berlin's Cheek to Cheek; Duke Ellington's Caravan; Kurt Weill's Lost in Stars; Cole Porter's In the Still of Night; Tall Trees in Georgia by Buffy Sainte-Marie and others.

"I picked these songs from a body of songs I preferred in the beginning of my career. I wanted to have a record of them with my band and a marker of what I used to do."

Although she performs in the jazz milieu, the songs on Still have refreshingly original arrangements.

"A lot of the songs on Still are very short," she says. "There aren't a lot of solos [which one would associate with jazz recordings.] This is a singer's record."

State does have a beautiful voice, perfectly suited for this "singer's record."

"I chose jazz because I don't think my vocals are suited to pop," she says. "Also the lyrics are timeless and important – the tunes are so beautiful."

Leah State called the 'future of Toronto's jazz scene'

On this CD, State and her band – consisting of Craig Harley, Andrew Downing, Justin Hayes and Jean Martin – experimented with multitracking and overdubs, also something not common in jazz recordings. However, when she records next time, State might go the opposite route and try the raw sound of a "live-off-the-floor" recording.

"Sometimes it's nice to be able to hear the room and the space and to leave the mistakes on. It's more intimate that way."

State doesn't let high accolades, such as the Toronto Star calling her "the future of Toronto's jazz scene," get to her head.

"It is really hard to make a living," State says. "I could do weddings and bar mitzvahs – but making money is not my motivation."

There is some promise of that, though. CBC Radio may be recording one of her concerts for broadcast in the future, and State is optimistic that anything can happen.

"Whenever I get discouraged I realize that I have this record and I'm playing great clubs. Two years ago, I wouldn't have dreamed that CBC would call to record my show – maybe five years from now I'll be doing things I now wouldn't dream of doing. Who knows?"

State performs at the Top of the Senator and other local clubs frequently. She also performs with an all female group called Runcible Spoon. For the rest of May, State performs at Toronto's newest jazz club, Sax on Yonge, 545 Yonge St. every Thursday from 5:30pm-8:30pm.

You can get an updated list of her gigs at www.leahstate.com.

Her CD Still is available through jazzpromo.com, HMV and the breath.com

State comptroller's report criticizes Bedouin policy

By ORI NIR
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The state comptroller has joined the harsh criticism academics and activists have been voicing for years about government policy toward Israel's Bedouin minority.

In an understated tone peppered with damning facts and figures, the comptroller's annual report, released last week, shows how the Bedouin community has grown in numbers and needs since 1948 – and how government after government largely ignored these needs.

Today, after years of neglect, the Bedouin community in the southern Negev desert suffers from a higher rate of poverty than the overall population, higher rates of crime, drugs and unemployment, worse health and education services, and appalling infrastructure.

"You neglect what is basically a loyal, quiet, nonpoliticized population, and it ends up exploding in your face. There is no way around it," says Thabet abu-Ras of Ben-Gurion University, an expert on the Bedouin.

It is a quiet explosion, with no big protests or violent riots, just a silent but steady process of alienation. Most Bedouin now share the antagonistic, estranged attitude most Israeli Arabs have toward the Jewish state.

Most Bedouin voters once backed Zionist parties, particularly Labour, but in recent elections, most voted for Arab parties, mainly the one that includes Israel's radical Islamic movement.

Most young Bedouin men once volunteered for the army. Today, only a handful of Negev Bedouin do so, by unofficial accounts, a mere dozen in 2001.

As well, the Negev Bedouin were once apolitical, almost unexposed to Arab nationalism. Today, they express opinions that often are more militant than their Arab brethren in the Galilee.

A poll taken among Israeli Arabs last year showed Bedouins feel more estranged from the state than do Arab citizens in the north. Forty-two per cent said they reject Israel's right to exist, compared with 16 per cent in the non-Bedouin Arab sector.

The Negev's Bedouin population, today about 130,000, has grown more than ten-fold since 1948. Half of them live in seven townships that Israel built between 1966 and 1990, and half live in many small villages, farms and tiny tent-and-shack communities that are unplanned and unrecognized by the state.

Land ownership in the unrecognized communities is disputed. The Bedouin who live there and work some of the land claim ownership. A minority say they can prove their legal ownership with documents from the Ottoman and British governments that ruled Palestine before Israel's founding, while most claim a historical right of possession.

In 1976, the first Rabin government approved a set of terms and criteria to settle Bedouin land disputes for an area totalling approximately 380,000 square miles. Of these, disputes over just 54,000 square miles have been settled.

Townships have become havens of unemployment, crime and drugs

Since then, Bedouin have illegally invaded vast areas of state land. The state demolishes some of their new, unlicensed buildings, but does not effectively enforce the law. When it does, it sometimes uses force, which further alienates the population.

In February, the Israel Land Authority hired seven light airplanes, which sprayed chemicals to destroy Bedouin crops on approximately 4,300 square miles of disputed land.

Bedouin leaders say they aren't opposed to settling the disputes, but demand reasonable compensation for land they have occupied for generations.

The state comptroller's report criticizes all governments since the mid-1970s for not having tried to settle these disputes, and for not supplying reasonable infrastructure and services to the recognized townships.

Ya'akov Katz, director of the Bedouin Administration, the agency that executes government Bedouin policy, said the report's description of previous governments' handling of Bedouin issues is accurate.

But Katz said he expects a major breakthrough soon on land settlements, which would "start the ball rolling" to resolving related issues.

The townships were intended to attract the Bedouin, who for generations have been gradually abandoning their nomadic lifestyle. They were expected to seize the chance to live in permanent homes, with running water and electricity, roads, a sewage system and services such as schools and health clinics.

But the towns were built with minimal investment. Most homes are not connected to a sewage system and suffer from an unreliable water supply and damaged roads. And infrastructure in all seven townships has been little improved since they were built, the report states.

Without reasonable infrastructure, no industry and hardly any land reserves for farming, they have become havens of unemployment, crime and drugs.

"How can you expect such sorry communities to attract anyone?" says Yosef Ben-David of Hebrew University, a veteran scholar of Bedouin society. "What is happening is an opposite process: People who moved into the townships are now returning to the farms, to the unrecognized villages."

This return to a traditional, semi-nomadic way of life is not only the result of governmental negligence. Observers say it's also the natural reaction of a society that has gone through a change that proved faster and more dramatic than it could handle.

"This is a society that is used to slow changes," explains Alayan al-Kreinawi, director of the Center for the Study of Bedouin Society at Ben-Gurion University. "It does not have the tools to adjust to a globalized modern society, while trying to hold on to its religious and cultural tradition."

As a result, the Bedouin are much poorer than the overall population, with a higher unemployment rate and more people earning less than minimum wage.

The Bedouin sector is also the youngest in Israeli society. With an annual growth rate of 5.5 per cent, versus 2.6 per cent for the overall population, about 54 per cent of Bedouin are under 14, compared to 29 per cent of the overall population.

Unfortunately, the level of investment in education for the Bedouin is the lowest in the country, contributing to a high dropout rate. Only 43 per cent of Bedouin in the appropriate age group studied in Grade 12 in 1998, versus 81 per cent among the overall population.

In addition to the Negev Bedouin, there are also 65,000 Bedouins in the Galilee. These "northern" Bedouin are generally better off economically than their southern brethren, and a larger proportion of them – about 80 per cent – live in recognized villages with better services and infrastructure.

More of the northern Bedouin serve in the army than do their southern counterparts and the area over which they claim ownership is much smaller.

Canada abstains at UN on Jenin

The resolution condemned "the assaults by Israeli occupying forces against the Palestinian people, particularly in the Jenin refugee camp." It also slammed Israel's refusal to cooperate with the UN's fact-finding team to the Jenin refugee camp, "in disregard of Security Council resolution 1405."

The world body also demanded that Israel "cease all hindrances to the work of humanitarian organizations and UN agencies in the occupied Palestinian territory."

It an attempt to soften the text, countries also voted to emphasize "the importance of civilian safety and well-being in the whole Middle East region, [and] condemn in particular all acts of violence and terror resulting in deaths and injuries among Palestinian and Israeli civilians."

Canada said it abstained on the vote because the resolution "failed to address adequately and with full balance the chain of events that had led up to the situation today.

"Canada could not agree with the singling out of one party. The two parties must resume negotiations urgently. Israel must re-engage with the Palestinian Authority, and [Yasser] Arafat must use his authority not only to condemn terrorist attacks, but to bring those responsible to justice."

The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) would have preferred that Canada vote against the resolution, said CIC national chair Joseph Wilder. Given Canada's explanation of its vote, which is welcome, one would expect the logical conclusion to be a vote against this and similar measures, Wilder told The CJN.

Overall, though, Canada's voting pattern at the UN "is moving closer to what we've urged. To that extent, we're pleased. We're not saying we're totally satisfied. We're saying it's a move in the right direction," Wilder said.

The day after the UN vote and the pool hall bombing, Canada and the European Union, at a one-day summit in Toledo, Spain, released a joint statement decrying Mideast violence on both sides.

"We state our shared condemnation of violence and terrorism and express our distress at the loss of innocent Israeli and Palestinian life. We reiterate that there is no military solution to the conflict," the joint statement read, adding that land for peace must be the focus of talks leading a lasting solution.

Canadian youth volunteer for Israel

Halperin, who has been to Israel three times before, worked at the army base for two days and then went with the other volunteers to Jerusalem to help paint buildings in one of the city's poorer neighbourhoods.

"Here I am a box painter," Halperin said with a smile as she painted the coloured identification panels on the cartons.

The trip was Kahane's first ever visit to Israel. "I thought it would just be a great experience to come to Israel at this time and help out and see the way the army works. My husband was here about a month ago and he knew a guy in Toronto who had sent us some information about the trip. We didn't know what we were going to do at the army base, but it doesn't matter – it is just good to be here. In fact, it's great!"

Shupac was visiting Israel for the fifth time.

"I want to be here and show support for Israel. My friend and I had been talking about Israel for a long time and two weeks ago we decided that instead of talking we just wanted to come and help out," she said.

"When I get back home I am going to tell my friends that Israel really needs our support... and the impression that I have gotten is that they feel isolated and we need to be there to show solidarity."

The Canadians were well received by the IDF officers and the men involved in finding temporary work for the visitors.

Sgt. Doron Amir from Bat Yam was one of the many reservists who had received an emergency call-up order for the recently concluded Operation Defensive Shield in the West Bank.

Last week, he had still not been released back to his civilian life. Brush in hand, Amir was in charge of the Canadian carton painters.m

"It makes me feel good to see these people coming from Canada. It makes the people feel good," he said.

"It's very beautiful. What they are doing makes the soldiers happy to realize that the world thinks about us."

Base commander Lt.-Col. Rami Shmuel also thanked the volunteers for their help and concern.

"It's a wonderful project to see all these boys and girls come to Israel and help the army with all types of work we have here," Shmuel said.

"We are very happy to see all the people. I want to tell the leaders that arrange this project that if is a wonderful thing for Zionism for Israel and for [the IDF]."

Israeli sports aerobics team dominates meet

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In the world of competitive gymnastics, sports aerobics is the new kid on the block, the poor cousin trying to get noticed in the shadow cast by the more popular and better-known events like artistic gymnastics, rhythmic gymnastics and even acrobatics.

Sports aerobics is no less demanding, artistic and athletic than the other gymnastics disciplines, say its devotees. And it is making inroads into the public consciousness and among young athletes who are taking to the sport in growing numbers – at least in Israel.

Recently, Israel's national sports aerobics team was in Ontario for the Canadian Sports Aerobics Championships, hosted by the Brantford Gymnastics Academy at the Brantford and District Civic Centre. Despite the absence of one of their better performers, the four-athlete Israeli team dominated the competition.

The team's three girls – Alina Alekseenko, Ania Fedko and Karina Kaplun – finished first in the trio competition. In addition, Fedko and Kaplun were first and second respectively in individual novice routines for 11 to 14-year-olds, while Alekseenko finished first in an individual event for junior women (ages 14 to 17) and the team's sole male competitor, Yehuda Huber, came second in the men's senior event.

Nastia Lagovsky, perhaps the team's best athlete, was unable to attend the competition.

Hagit Diskin, manager of the Israeli National Sports Aerobics team, was pleased at the results, though she acknowledged the level of competition wasn't quite what they had expected.

Only Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia sent athletes and Israel was the only international team at the event. Romania, Belarus and France, the dominant world powers, stayed away even though the Brantford tournament was a world championship qualifier for the Canadians.

As Diskin explains it, sports aerobics is one of seven disciplines under the International Gymnastics Federation (FIG) umbrella. The others are artistic gymnastics (men and women), which includes the familiar rings, pommel horse, floor exercises and parallel bars events; rhythmic gymnastics; acrobatics (including pyramids and tumbling); trampoline; and general gymnastics. The latter involves group performances in events such as cheerleading, Diskin said.

FIG defines sports aerobics as the ability to perform complex and high intensity movement patterns to music. The musical aspect originated in traditional aerobic dance.

Participants perform a routine lasting less than two minutes and the routine must demonstrate continuous movement, flexibility, strength and utilization of basic moves.

"The competitor must also demonstrate combinations of aerobic steps and sequences, including the seven basic aerobic steps: knee lift, kick, jacks, lunge, march, jog and skip," FIG's Web site says.

In one of the Israeli team's more jaw-dropping moves, the trio performs one-handed push-ups while doing the splits – with both legs in the air and parallel to the floor!

Holly Abraham, technical director of Gymnastics Ontario, said the Israelis' performances were excellent. For Canadian athletes, trying their hands at a relatively new sport, "one of the great things having them here was so everyone could see the variations and variety and interesting combinations they put together."

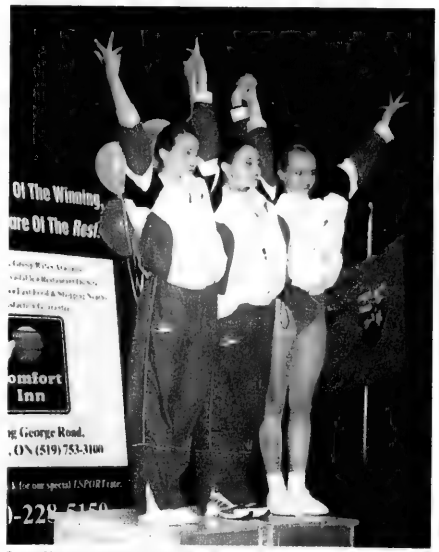
The Israelis exposed Canadian athletes to a high-level demonstration of the sport, she added.

Diskin said the Israeli team was looking for a tune-up in advance of the world championships, which will be held in Lithuania in July. The Israelis could have attended a world qualifier in France, but given safety issues, Canada was chosen instead.

Israeli sports authorities are telling the country's athletes to keep a low profile when abroad, to not wear team jackets, to avoid speaking Hebrew in public and to be especially careful, Diskin said.

A side benefit of the Canadian trip was to bring the Israelis for a visit to the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, where they demonstrated their sport and taught some choreography to the high school's gymnastics team.

In Brantford, prior to the Toronto leg of their trip, the Israelis were the class of the field. Given that the sport has been practised in Israel for only three years, Diskin is happy with the progress the team is making. At a competition in Holland last March, Alekseenko, 16, finished first and Lagovsky fourth. Huber finished seventh.



Israel's golden girls finished first in the trio event at the Canadian sports aerobics championships. From left: Karina Kaplun, Ania Fedko and Alina Alekseenko.

Huber was much better in Brantford, continuing the improvement he's shown since taking up the sport a year ago.

A physical education student at the Wingate Institute in Netanya, Huber was into track and field, gymnastics and folk dance before trying his hand at sports aerobics. Diskin, who lectures at Wingate, suggested he give the sport a try and once he did, he was hooked.

"You need to dance in this sport. It's completely different than anything I ever did. It's very intensive. It combines elements of gymnastics, jumps and falls," Huber said.

Huber said one of his favourite moves is a straddle jump and full turn, and he can land a 720 degree (double turn) in the air.

Sports aerobics is enjoying moderate popularity in Israel as it tries to make inroads in a country where the number 1 and 2 sports are soccer and basketball. More young people are taking to "fun sports" like acrobatics and sports aerobics, Huber said.

Another sport gaining popularity is capuera, an activity that originated in Brazil and combines gymnastics moves with dancing and kicks. "It demands acrobatic skills," Huber said.

People are enrolling in sports aerobics to give them the basic skills to enable them to continue in capuera, he said.

As for Israel's prospects at the sports aerobics world championships, Diskin said the team has a legitimate shot at a medal, particularly from Legovsky, who is an elite athlete.

Lagovsky immigrated from Russia a few years ago after finishing first in the Russian Junior Championships. She still spends much of her time in Russia, training with top coaches and athletes, Diskin said.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

I'm in Grade 12 and my prom is quickly approaching. I don't have a boyfriend and so far nobody has asked me to be their date. I really want to go to the prom, but can I really go without a date?

Uncertain

Dear Uncertain,

If you want to attend the prom, then there is no reason why you should not. Firstly there is no rule that says you can only go to the prom if you have a date. Sometimes it's a lot more fun going solo; you feel free to be with whomever you want, and you don't have to feel tied down to one person the whole night.

Another option is to organize a group of girlfriends that you can go with. I'm sure that you are not the only one without a date. Why not ask all of your friends who are also "dateless" to go together in one big group.

Lastly, if it is very important to you to have a date, why not ask someone to go to prom with you? We are living in a time of equality. In 2002, there is no reason why a Grade 12 girl should feel uncomfortable about being forward. I suggest asking a guy friend you feel close to and at ease with. If you ask someone you can have fun with, you are assured of having a good night.

Prom night is not about "boyfriends and girlfriends." It's about sharing that one last night with the special friends who have contributed to your high school experience. You should be with them, whether or not you have a date.

Dear Karilani is written on a rotating basis by three high school students. The drawing is a composite. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN.

Israel Emergency Report

The View From Jerusalem

Twenty months of terror have exacted a terrible toll on Israel. The cost of caring for terror survivors is enormous. But Israeli government funds for social services are dwindling because the cost of defense and security is even higher.

The most powerful testimony about Israel's emergency comes from those who are living through it. Among them is 30 year old Moti Mizrahi, whose story was brought back to us from a recent mission to Israel by UJA Federation donor Mark Waldman.

On March 9, Moti stopped off for a drink, as he usually did, at Jerusalem's Moment Café. A few minutes later, a massive suicide bombing blast threw him to the ground, with his arm severed and his skull fractured. Doctors managed to re-attach his arm, but Moti lay unconscious for three days and has already undergone two operations. Afflicted by perpetual pain, Moti, remarkably, remains optimistic about the future.

In Israel today, there are more than 3,000 men, women and children just like Moti. They need our support. Now. More than ever.

Graham visits Mideast

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham is scheduled to be in the Middle East this week, and to arrive in Israel this Saturday night for meetings with top officials.

Graham was to have left on a week-long trip to the region this past Tuesday. He's slated to visit Egypt, Jordan, Israel and the Palestinian territories.

An Israeli government spokesperson told The CJN that Graham was scheduled to arrive in Israel May 25. A meeting with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is scheduled for May 26 and one with Foreign Minister Shimon Peres the next day.

Steve Hibbert, Canada's diplomatic envoy to the Palestinian Authority, was unable to confirm to The CJN whether Graham would meet with Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat. But it's widely believed the two will hold a face-to-face meeting.

Graham will be in the Palestinian territories only for a few hours on May 26. He's then scheduled to return to Israel, and depart the next day.

Graham was to have travelled to the region in March, but postponed the trip because of the current turmoil.

The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) was to meet with Graham prior to his departure for a briefing. The CIC will doubtless watch this trip closely, as Graham has come in for some criticism for remarks he has made about Israel and the current conflict, as well as for praise for what is perceived as Canada's more pro-Israel stance at the United Nations.

Israel's ambassador to Canada, Haim Divon, will accompany Graham on the Israeli leg of the journey.

Canadian a key adviser to Sharon

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

This past Passover, Shalom Lipner fulfilled a holiday mitzvah by hosting several out-of-town guests at his home in Jerusalem. For many of the visiting dignitaries, it was their first opportunity to experience first-hand the ancient Jewish family ritual that is part of the spring festival.

It also provided Lipner, an assistant foreign policy adviser to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, the opportunity to cement relationships with his guests, who happened to be in town on an important business trip.

Shalom Lipner

It wasn't the first time Lipner had met U.S. Marine Gen. Anthony Zinni. As a senior civil servant in the foreign policy establishment, he had been at the airport to greet Zinni when the general first stepped on Israeli soil.

Since then, the two have developed a rapport and a comfort level that might have something to do with their common North American origins. Though he holds a senior position in the Israeli foreign policy-making bureaucracy, Lipner, 36, is a native of Toronto, an alumni of a local Jewish high school (Or Chaim) and someone keenly aware of the American mindset.

Anti-Semitism alive in France: Samuels

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There was a time in France when the expression of anti-Semitic attitudes was distasteful and not spoken of in polite society.

A sort of "Holocaust teflon" existed that stifled overt manifestations of Jew-hatred and kept Jews relatively free from attack. There were lapses, of course, such as the comment by then-French Prime Minister Raymond Barré that, unfortunately, four innocent French passersby were killed in the 1982 terrorist bombing of the Rue Copernic synagogue.

But there was nothing at the time to compare to the situation today, when anti-Semitic expression "has become a matter of opinion" and when Jews are being warned to take precautions if they intend to walk in the streets of France (or Germany) while displaying outward manifestations of their religion, said Shimon Samuels, the Paris-based director for international liaison for the Simon Wiesenthal Centre.

Samuels believes European Jews are facing a new reality. "The floodgates have burst" and areas of discourse that were once out of bounds have now entered the public realm, he said.

As mostly Muslim thugs attack synagogues and individual Jews, they do so "with the applause of the charming anti-Semitic class, the cocktail anti-Semites. It goes from cocktail chatter to cocktail Molotov," said Samuels, who recently visited Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal, where he spoke about the situation facing French Jews.

Shimon Samuels

While France and the rest of the world focus on the challenge of far-right French presidential candidate Jean-Marie LePen – whom Samuels characterizes as a fascist brawler and a longtime anti-Semite – the political establishment in France must take responsibility for allowing the situation to deteriorate to the point where attacks on Jews have proliferated. More than 400 anti-Semitic incidents have been recorded in recent months, Samuels said.

One possible reason for the government's inertia may have been illustrated in a recent letter penned by Pascal Boniface, a socialist intellectual and top foreign policy advisor to Prime Minister Lionel Jospin.

In the letter, Boniface noted that Muslim voters far outnumber Jewish ones. This created "a certain contempt" for the Jewish electorate, Samuels said.

(The "Letter to an Israeli Friend" also warned French Jews that they would be "the loser" if they continued to back the Israeli government.)

When President Jacques Chirac launched his re-election campaign in Garges-les-Gonesse, a Paris suburb, just after a Jewish school bus was attacked and an eight-year-old girl shot, he sent invitations to all the local communities except one – the Jewish community, Samuels said.

What's more, not only did he not mention the attack in his remarks, during the event "he walked over to a man in a keffiyah and kissed him on the head," Samuels added.

The image left in France was that he was "bending over backwards for the Arab vote."

French politicians who have attended commemorations for Jewish victims of anti-Semitism have turned the events on their head.

"When they come to console the Jews, they turn it into an attack on [Israeli Prime Minister Ariel] Sharon," Samuels said.

A recent rally in Paris to oppose anti-Semitic attacks and stand in solidarity with Israel, attended by 200,000 people, was sparsely attended by French political leaders. Chirac and Jospin were both conspicuous by their absence, Samuels said.

In addition to political insensitivity, French law enforcement officials have been downplaying the incidents of anti-Semitism, Samuels contended. In December 2001, the minister of the interior released an annual report of hate crimes that indicated incidents of anti-Semitism were down from the year before – despite a surge of attacks targeting Jews. "It was really a joke," Samuels said.

"There has been a particular problem of denial," he continued. Pointing to the school bus attack, Samuels said "police wrote it out as a broken window" incident.

More recently police have made some arrests, but Samuels said authorities have a "revolving door" policy in which suspects are soon released. The result has been an atmosphere in which attacks on Jews can occur undeterred.

"I think the Socialist government is reaping what they sowed."

Samuels said his contacts in the Muslim community tell him they too are concerned about the importation of radical imams from Algeria, funded by Saudi Arabia and Iran, who preach fundamentalist versions of the religion.

The fundamentalists appeal to alienated young people who live in wretched conditions, often near Jewish working class neighbourhoods.

"These frustrated youngsters are being told in prayer halls and jihadist Qu'uranic schools to go bomb a synagogue," Samuels said.

The political establishment has "always been scared of demonstrations and they're scared of Muslim violence, of it spilling into the French sector."

Instead of confronting it, they appear to be appeasing it, he added.

Going against the grain with home schooling

SHIRA HONIG
CJN Staff

Special Report

TORONTO — When Joyce Solomon first became aware of the homeschooling movement a decade ago, she was skeptical of the idea for her own children.

"[Homeschooling] is really going against the grain of what is looked upon as normalized Jewish education," says the Toronto mother.

In fact, she says, it took a lot of convincing; homeschoolers are a tiny minority within this city's Jewish community. But the more she read about it, the more it appealed to her. After having homeschooled each of her three children for several years – Aviva, 18, currently in Israel; Yehuda, 14, in Grade 9; and Chaya Malka, 11, in Grade 6 (both currently at Jewish day schools) – she stands by her decision.

"I see institutionalized education as setting up to fail because it cannot meet individual needs from day to day," she says.

"A teacher can only spread herself or himself so thin," even with assistance, she says.

Moreover, she says, there's no continuity in school. Usually, there's a different teacher each year.

Leia Saltzman

"A teacher may work well for one student but not for another" and so "you don't see over time the same growth that you would in a more positive circumstance."

Instead, kids burn out quickly. Their natural inquisitiveness decreases as they learn what the system says they should learn and how they should learn it, she says, adding that individual ideas are not encouraged.

Sarah Feuerstein, who is active in Toronto's homeschooling community and runs the Toronto homeschoolers e-mail list, adds that in school, children "become used to the idea that learning is something that is done to them." And once that idea has set in, she says, it's very hard to get rid of.

On the other hand, she says, kids who are homeschooled – particularly those at home from the beginning – experience learning as exploration.

This is particularly true because "homeschoolers do not have to follow the official provincial guidelines," says Feuerstein, who homeschooled her younger son, Benjamin, now 16, because he was having trouble socially in school.

Although this may sound scary to the "well intentioned, concerned critics" who fear that kids will end up without any education, the opposite is true, she says.

"Most people are not aware [of] how much time kids in a regular school sit around waiting while the teacher explains things to some other kids, checks everybody else's work, not to speak of time spent on disciplining, administrative note-taking, etc.

"Most families manage to teach their kids more than [what] the required guidelines call for, simply because they have so much more time for education than in a school setting." (Visit www.edu.gov.on.ca for all Ontario curriculum requirements.)

But Shula Strassfeld, who homeschooled her daughter Leia Saltzman, now 15, from grades 6 to 8, says although she misses the homeschooling experience, she knows Leia is not guaranteed an Ontario Secondary School Diploma unless she fulfills the requirements at a recognized high

An itinerary of history

While in Israel recently, I had the very good fortune of travelling with a tour guide named Amir Orly.

Born in the early 1950s, a fourth generation Israeli, Orly has those indispensible qualities that only the best teachers possess: driving intellectual curiosity, commanding knowledge, love of sharing his knowledge and a manner of sharing that instills in his students the yearning for more sharing.

It was the day after Yom Ha'atzmaut and we were headed away from the Negev northward towards Tel Aviv. History rather than geography would be the focus of our touring that day.

We had four stops on our itinerary.

• Independence Hall. Formerly the home of the first mayor of Tel Aviv, Meir Dizengoff, this boxy, rectangular building, set back a handful of metres from the curb on busy Rothschild Street, was the National Gallery of Tel Aviv when David Ben-Gurion gathered many of the leaders of the Yishuv there in the late afternoon of Shabbat eve May 14, 1948.

Fully aware of the hour of the day, as the sun was setting in the western sky, and of the hour in history as an altogether different sun was rising on a profoundly new dawn, Ben-Gurion, sounding fierce but calm, read the elegant Hebrew inscription on the Declaration of Independence of the State of Israel in that building.

The room in which the Declaration was read has been preserved in all its detail, from the stern, proud portrait of Theodore Herzl that hangs on the wall behind the dais to the rows of wooden chairs neatly aligned in front of it.

In a fraction of an instant of a reverie, one hears the Old Man's voice and sees the room just as it was 54 years ago. The reverie is punctured by the call to proceed to the next stop of the tour; we leave the hall and step again into the bright Mediterranean light of bustling Rothschild Street.

We travel only a few minutes until our next stop, also on Rothschild Street.

• The Haganah Museum. Formerly the home of Eliahu Golomb, the founder and first leader of the Haganah, the elegant three-storey home served as the central headquarters of the Haganah.

Recently renovated, it is now an eye-opening museum in which a myriad of multi-media exhibits recount the history of the Yishuv from the earliest days of the last century to Israel's War of Independence.

The exhibits feature original artifacts, documents, display models, narratives and videos, all of which combine to create a profoundly moving experience.

From the Haganah Museum we travel one or two kilometres on the edge of the shore towards Jaffa.

• The Etzel Museum. The museum rises like a rectangular black glass bunker from a base of masonry, stone and arches. It integrates the modern and the traditional in a replica of the state itself.

Etzel is an acronym of three Hebrew letters: aleph, tzadi and lamed (IZL), the first letters of three Hebrew words, Irgun Tzva'i Leumi, the National Military Organization. The organization was also known in Hebrew simply as The Irgun, one of the Jewish underground fighting forces active in Mandatory Palestine from 1931-1948, that retaliated against Arab terrorism and British anti-Jewish, immigration and policing policies.

The museum exhibit is devoted to the IZL combat from Nov. 29, 1947 (the date of the partition vote in the United Nations) until the dissolution of the IZL as an independent fighting force and its integration into the Israel Defence Forces on June 1, 1948. Like the other two museums, the Etzel Museum was fascinating and even inspiring. But nothing could prepare me for the fourth stop on our tour.

• The Ayalon Institute. The word "institute" in the name of this place is used in an ironic, tongue-in-cheek sense.

On the edge of the Weizmann Institute in Rehovot, the place, now also a museum, was formerly a mini-community, reception and training centre for new immigrants to Mandatory Palestine on their way to established or new kibbutzim in the Yishuv. It was called the Hill of the Kibbutzim and comprised living quarters, a dining hall, a chicken coop, a cow barn, a vegetable garden, a bakery and a laundromat. Or so it seemed outwardly to most of the people who lived there and especially to the British Mandatory police who patrolled there constantly.

Secretly, the place was the largest, secret factory for making bullets of the clandestine pre-state Israel Military Industry.

But what must be seen to be truly believed is how and where the factory operated. It was underground, some four metres below the ground and stretching over 250 square metres.

The laundromat and the bakery were the camouflaged entry points into the factory. One stairwell was underneath the heavy, spinning laundry machine in the laundromat. The other stairwell was underneath the 10-ton kiln in the bakery.

A walk through the factory, the "institute," immediately causes the visitor to marvel: the ingenuity of the design, the attention to countless life-and-death details, the secrecy of the operation, the bravery of the workers and the overwhelming, total, personal dedication to the cause of helping to bring about the birth of the modern State of Israel.

I travelled that day with my tour guide on an itinerary of living history.

MORALE BOOSTER:

Students at Kehila Jewish Day School in Hamilton helped to boost morale in Israel. The school saw a message on the Internet from yeshiva students in Jerusalem who were requesting cards and letters of support from around the world. The yeshiva plans to send the cards on to schools, as well as post them at bus stops and stores. Kehila students wrote personal messages on cards they printed and decorated themselves.

Anti-Israel drawings hung in Toronto high school

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Teachers and students walking into Sir Winston Churchill Collegiate Institute in Scarborough were met recently with children's drawings depicting shark-like Israeli planes dropping bombs on buildings.

A translation of the Arabic caption underneath the connect-the-dot drawings states: "Our schools, buildings and gardens are being destroyed."

A Star of David on the wing identifies the airplane causing the havoc. Some of the pictures were augmented with drawings of people lying on the ground beside destroyed buildings, as well as additional Arabic writing.

One picture had a handwritten caption above it stating: "Allah is great over Israel Allah is great."

According to a source that requested anonymity, many students at the high school, located at Lawrence Avenue and Kennedy Road, celebrated the Sept. 11 attack on the World Trade Center as a victory for Arab causes.

The school's principal, Trina Wood, said she is aware of the pictures but refused to comment.

"This goes beyond me," she said in a phone interview, adding that there is an Arabic-language school that meets on school premises on Saturdays and that it has a permit from the Toronto District School Board (TDSB) to do so.

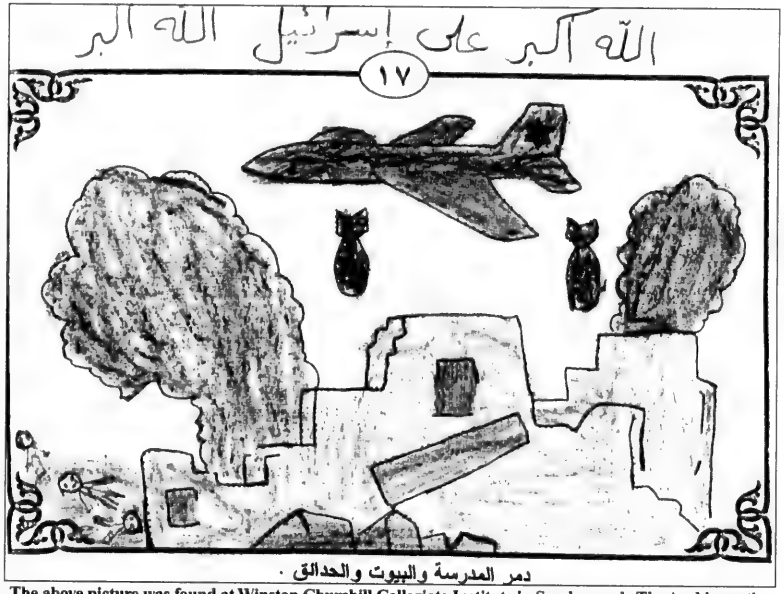
However, a TDSB spokesperson said she is unaware of any Arabic-language program with a permit for that school.

Another TDSB spokesperson said permits would only be issued by the board after the programs were approved by the particular school's principal and caretaker.

Whether the Arab-language program is public or private, the drawings represent the worst kind of political propaganda and shouldn't be part of any school curriculum, said Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

School trustee Scott Harrison said any permitted program would have to fall within basic TDSB guidelines.

Trustee Gerri Gershon and TDSB spokesperson Jennifer McIntyre said they are investigating the matter.



The above picture was found at Winston Churchill Collegiate Institute in Scarborough. The Arabic caption underneath reads "Our schools, buildings and gardens are being destroyed," while the handwritten phrase above states "Allah is great over Israel Allah is great."

Speech contest winners envision a new Zionism

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Three of the winners of a local Zionist speech contest are set to attend the 34th Zionist Congress, to be held in Jerusalem June 17 to 20.

The contest was organized by the New Zionist Initiative, YYZ branch, a grassroots group formed by about 20 Toronto participants in a World Zionist Organization leadership conference held about 1½ years ago.

Robert Gasner, one of the group's founders, said that following the conference, group members decided to become activists "in order to help give new content and energy to Diaspora Zionism."

The group's first effort was a Zionist debate, titled Heavyweight Boxing for the Jewish Mind, held last November.

"The aim of the debate was to elevate Diaspora Zionist activity from sentimentalism and platitudes to the kind of struggling-with-issues that once characterized Diaspora Zionism," said Benjamin Rubin, one of the debate organizers, who also tied for second place in the recent speech contest.

"In the determination of Israel as a Jewish democratic state, North American Jews seamlessly combine allegiance to both the democratic and Jewish tradition. We felt, what better way to show our Jewish and democratic values than in a civilized debate… over contentious Jewish issues?" said Rubin.

The group organized the speech contest, he said, because current events in Israel are making the need for a restatement of a Zionist vision and agenda more acute than ever.

The participants were asked to say what they think the Zionist vision should be, in light of where we are in Jewish history.

"We were pleased with the seriousness and the high quality of the responses. Writing and presenting a 1,000-word paper is a real effort," said Rubin.

The first place winner, Jeff Chorlton, won airfare to Israel, five days accommodation and a chance to participate in the Zionist Congress.

Second place winners, Rubin, and Barbara Benoliel, won half their airfare to Israel, five days accommodation and participation in the congress.

Chorlton's speech envisioned Israel in 2007 and imagined a future peace treaty that vastly improves life in the Jewish State.

"We have finally begun to realize our place among nations while achieving the security and well being that previously eluded us and which used to be our mirage when we used to look to the relative serenity of the western world," he said in the speech, adding that, despite improvements in the wake of the imaginary treaty, much work needs to be done.

"Zionism has evolved from the dream of creating a Jewish homeland to setting a moral and economic example for the rest of the world.

"Now that we have achieved peace with our neighbours, we can help to spread this peace to peoples and nations who seek, but have not yet been able to find such peace in their homelands."

From left, Jason Adelman, third place winner; Jeff Chorlton, first place winner; Benjamin Rubin, one of two second place winners.

Zionism means not only aspiring to great heights in our homeland, Chorlton said, but recognizing our role as the leadership, protection and solace for the Jewish Diaspora.

Rubin wrote about Zionism Phase II, which he said calls for a return to the original Zionist creative impulse.

"Zionism Phase II calls for new Zionist leadership; for political reform of the Israel-Diaspora relationship; for building an inclusive model of Jewish civilization; for pioneering new forms of creative collective effort; for generating a vision of a model society; and for reaching out to other civilizations.

"Israel's goal is not only survival. The true goal of Zionism was a renaissance of Jewish civilization…"

The new Zionism, Benoliel said in her speech, "is the old Zionism; revisited, expanded, inclusive. It requires the same faith, the same goals and the same commitment of our grandfathers and grandmothers...

"The new Zionism requires the same courage and the same leap of faith to go beyond the current conflict and see visions of the future, and most importantly, to include the Palestinians in the dream."

Benoliel's new Zionism would feed everyone, attend to everyone's needs, regardless of place, politics or position.

"When we offer the Palestinians a piece of Zionism as a joint commitment to a quality of life for all the inhabitants of the region, we live a Zionism that truly honours differences and offers hope. If we invest in improving the lives of everyone, we will benefit," said Benoliel.

The winning speeches can be viewed at www.newhouseofisrael.org/zvc.htm.

a lot of Earning Money Can Change Your Life

What would you change if your annual income suddenly became your monthly income? Just imagine...think of the difference it would make. For over thirty years I have been teaching people from Asia to America...how to earn money – a lot of money. Money is an interesting subject. Hardly anyone will get into a serious conversation about money. If you have some, there are an army of advisors who will help you invest it, but few people can explain how to earn it in abundance. School does not teach people to earn money. Earning money has nothing to do with EDUCATION, AGE, GENDER, PAST PERFORMANCE OR INTELLIGENCE. In fact, many brilliant people are broke and others who are not so bright are very wealthy.

I represent a small group of people from a highly respected network marketing company who are looking for 6 or 7 individuals who are serious about wanting to dramatically improve their income. If you are one of those individuals they are prepared to invest their time and money in your future. They are hiring me and my expertise to work directly with you... helping you build a very lucrative business...quickly.

You can work from your home full or part time. Our first objective will be to turn your annual income into a monthly income. If this seriously appeals to you, email me your name, address, phone number and one short paragraph describing your present situation. I will meet you in Toronto the week of May 27th to discuss this opportunity with serious individuals. Please forward to:

The debt we owe our young collegians

The academic year has now drawn to a close on university and college campuses across the country. Exams are over. Essays and other writing assignments have been handed in. As students await their results or prepare for their graduation, we, the older generation, must acknowledge the enormous debt we owe them, the younger generation on campus.

Students face a constant barrage of intellectual, peer and other social challenges on campus. After all, the years at university are the stage in their lives when challenge and confrontation are the whetstone of a honing mind and a maturing soul.

This year, however, especially after the Durban conference last September, our students have also had to face challenges and confrontations of a more unsettling sort: the barrage of anti-Israel, even anti-Semitic, propaganda and advocacy among fellow students and even among some faculty. That barrage, when unceasing, when vocal, when constantly in-your-face, as it was on some campuses, can be intimidating for even the most securely identifying Jewish student.

To be sure, none of the campuses in Canada was as menacing for Jewish students as the most notorious campuses in Europe or in the United States. But for the first time since the early 1980s, an inhospitable, anti-Israel atmosphere hovered over many activities on Canadian university campuses. It takes a great measure of individual resolve and a deep reservoir of personal courage to persevere on behalf of Israel despite the feeling of intimidation. If this is true for the campuses in our larger cities, how much more so for the campuses in smaller communities where the number of Jewish students is so much less?

But, as The CJN reported from time to time during the school year, Israel's advocates on campus – our students – defended the Jewish state wherever and whenever they could. They were not defeated by the intimidation, nor did they wilt in the occasionally suffocating, noxious atmosphere of egregious anti-Israel polemic. On the contrary. On campuses across the country, our students organized, planned and implemented a variety of creative, pro-Israel programming to counter the hostile propaganda and to engage the minds, if not the hearts, of fellow students who simply do not have the information or the knowledge concerning Israel's cause.

Thus it is indeed more than a debt we owe to our students. It is also a promise that we, their parents and the organized communities to which we belong, will strive to ensure that they never feel alone on their respective campuses in "fighting the fight."

The funding agencies of the various Jewish communities across the country must dedicate sufficient resources to enable Jewish students on campus to maintain, expand, or, where lacking, to begin programming aimed at educating the uneducated, at defending Israel and at strengthening the inter-campus networks of Jewish student activists.

They are our children; to them, we owe a great deal; from them we learn a great deal.

Readers admire Sheikh Palazzi

Janice Arnold's article on Sheikh Abdul Hadi Palazzi (CJN, May 9) was great. Sheikh Palazzi is really brave. I'm sure many radicals want his head. His critics say, "Using synagogues to give [him] public voice during these tense times is simply irresponsible." But isn't a "public voice" what keeps democracy alive? Isn't this "public voice" what motivates many Arabs to live in Israel, Canada and elsewhere? Is there any immigration to those Arab countries that don't have a "public voice?" I believe that most Muslims in the countries without a "public voice" don't really believe in suicide bombers. If they did, we would see a lot more similar incidents. In these countries, people are afraid of not towing the "party line" – they have no "public voice" to say they don't buy this radical message.

The article about Sheikh Palazzi gave me some real food for thought. I have not studied the Qu'ran, so I cannot comment on his interpretation of Islam, but I do agree with his position on the current intifadah, and I appreciated his comments on the freedoms enjoyed by Israeli Arabs. The fact that Israeli Arabs enjoy status as citizens speaks volumes about the contrasts between Israel and neighbouring Arab states.

Support the National Post

We must recognize the significant contribution the National Post has made in its definitive, objective and truthful editorial commentary. One cannot overlook the manner in which Israeli news is being presented to the Canadian public. One, of course, must recommend that the community continue to support The Canadian Jewish News by advertising in the paper, but I am concerned that we are not supporting the National Post in that regard. A newspaper cannot exist without advertising revenue and I implore our community to support the Post with their advertising dollars.

I have no financial interest in the National Post; however, I know that its publisher is a man of great integrity who strongly supports Israel and all facets of the Jewish community.

We must keep the breath of fresh air provided by the Post viable. I implore the community to support it.

Jerusalem's visitor centre

I recently returned from Israel, where I visited a very impressive, colourful visitors' centre in Jerusalem.

In the late 1990s, in anticipation of the millenium, construction of a visitors' centre began at the site of the southern wall excavations, adjacent to the Temple Mount in Jerusalem. The centre's purpose was to host the many thousands of people, both from Israel and abroad, who were expected to come and visit the excavation. In 2000, millions of tourists came to visit Israel; by September of that year, a record number of tourists had arrived.

Unfortunately, the centre was not completed in time for the millenium in January 2000. Instead, it opened some 10 months later, in October of the same year. By then, the intifadah had broken out. The violence that ensued and the negative media headlines and TV broadcasts around the world were enough to keep tourists away from Israel. They would have been as enthralled by the beauty of the magnificent centre as I was.

My tour guide and I walked down on ramps that included glass sections through which you could see aerial views of Jerusalem. Beneath us, there were also many impressive scale models of the city, as well as video displays.

I was fortunate to experience it, but it was upsetting to see how the centre stood empty. Only a small handful of people arrive on an average day. I hope and pray that it will some day welcome the millions of tourists who will once again come to Jerusalem.

Actions of Israel like those of the U.S.

With all the pro-Palestinian propaganda I've read in the media, I feel it's about time I stood up for the pro-Israel cause.

But first things first. I don't like all this killing – whether it's by Israelis or Palestinians – any more than anyone else. It's regrettable many innocent people have died.

However, the only reason Israel went into the West Bank was to protect its own citizens. Any democratic country needs to do that. With the number of suicide bombings that have happened, Israel had to do something. It couldn't sit back and allow these injustices to continue.

While people have condemned Israel for what happened in the West Bank, there isn't the same condemnation for the suicide bombings by the Palestinians. The Palestinians believe that by blowing themselves up while killing Israelis, they become martyrs. But they're wrong. They become murderers.

What Israel has done is no different than what the United States is doing in Afghanistan – both are fighting terrorism. So, either you are for both Israel and the United States or you are against them. You can't be for one and against the other. They are both fighting for a common goal.

Hopefully, people can now understand the position Israel is in and, hopefully, terrorism and other injustices can be brought to an end.

Hope in the reserves

By HASKELL NUSSBAUM

It's three o'clock in the morning and we're stuck in the mud. Normal people are generally asleep this long past the witching hour, but tonight we are not ordinary people but reservists on emergency call-up with the Israel Defence Forces.

We're in the middle of a live-ammunition exercise and our predicament catches me with a few hundred rounds of machine-gun ammunition still unfired. My machine-gun, however, is mounted on top of the armoured personnel carrier (APC) we are riding, which is now resting at a very unnatural angle, with nearly its entire left side swallowed by mud.

Beside me in the APC, an officer is shouting at the driver to go forward, backward, sideways, but it's clear to me that we are going nowhere. We've fallen into a pit, and in the deep recesses of my mind, I hear a female friend crack a joke about men not wanting to ask for directions. Being stuck in the mud can easily be a metaphor for the mechanics of our call-up and for our reserve unit in general, but in fact it is the opposite.

Call it an anti-metaphor. For when I look at our unit, I see a group of civilians shucking off their street clothes and morphing into an effective fighting force at cheetah-like speed.

But underneath the grease-stained uniforms, the civilians remain. The officer shouting at the driver is a student studying agriculture in Rehovot. The driver, in real life, is a cabbie who knows he will be teased mercilessly for ending up on his side.

It's impossible for me to see the men around me without seeing their chosen lives poking through the green of their uniforms. One of our snipers is a high school teacher who wonders about the quality of the substitute the school will find. Another is a jeweller with a shop that will suffer from his absence.

Our unit has at least five lawyers or law students, a few mechanical engineers, an accountant and some entrepreneurs. The soft-spoken fighter sporting a long beard is a rabbi, who carries with him a tiny paperback version of the Mishnah, to poke his head into whenever there's a break in the training.

And the majority of the unit is married, with wives and children waiting anxiously. The cell phones we all carry are umbilical cords to our loved ones.

One of the ironies of this emergency call-up is that not one of us wants to be here, yet morale is extremely high. Of the nearly 600 soldiers called up with us, all but 15 showed up within 24 hours. A few of the missing ambled in over the next few days.

Reservists, called up for Operation Defensive Shield, being briefed in the field.

A Reserve soldier on his armoured personnel carrier. [Israel photos]

We are not here for sport. We are stationed so close to Lebanon that every time the Hezbollah pound the Israeli bases on Har Dov, we can not only hear the mortars landing but we can see the smoke rising. We all hope that the tension will continue to ease, and indeed that it will ebb away.

In almost every stint of reserve duty, there comes a moment that touches me emotionally. This time, the moment came so powerfully that it brought tears to my eyes. It was during the Memorial Day ceremony for Israel's fallen soldiers. As hundreds of soldiers, reservists all, stood at attention, five soldiers read personal poems and stories of soldiers who had fallen in battle.

Immediately afterwards, without microphones or professional singers, the entire group sang Hatikvah together.

The ceremony touched me because I knew that there was not one soldier there, including me, who was not thinking the same thought: that fallen soldier could be me, and as soon as next week. When the commanding officer said a few words about the privilege he felt to be serving with so men many willing to make sacrifices for their country, the words resonated. They bounced off our uniforms and filled the night air with their truth.

It was, I think, the first time that I truly absorbed the words of our national anthem. To be free in our country. A freedom that others before us have paid for in a currency that cannot be repaid.

When we first arrived at our base, I questioned a friend about our abilities to fight, about our capabilities as reservists. I wondered openly whether we were not, in fact, heading for a quagmire not unlike the one that ensnared our APC.

My friend reminded me that all of Israel's wars were fought and won by reservists just like us. After a week in the field, I realized he was right. Though we hope that war will be avoided, we are "ready, willing and able."

In the end, even our trapped APC was towed out of its mud cage within an hour. Efficiently and safely. An apt metaphor, after all.

Is it good for the Jews?

When I was growing up in Germany, in the early part of the 20th century, anti-Semitism was rife, the political and social situation in the country was totally unstable and each day seemed to present a new challenge for us.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

One day I asked my father: "How do you know what's good or bad? Everything seems to change all the time."

My dad gave me an answer that has stayed with me all my life: He said: "I always ask myself, 'Is it good for the Jews?'"

To this day, his answer looms in the back of my mind when certain policies and situations need to be assessed. To be sure, this kind of view seems very narrow, but on second view, it has a broader aspect.

Let me put it into larger terms and say that you can assess the health of a society by the way it treats its minorities. If it is stable, it will treat them well. If it is unstable, likely it will not. Therefore, since Jews have always been the quintessential example of a minority, the way we are treated does throw a telltale light on the situation of the country in which we live.

The question, "Is it good for the Jews?" therefore makes sense in the broad spectrum of social and political assessment. A society that treats its minorities properly, with respect and a sense of fairness, is most likely in good moral, social and political shape.

Again, you may look at this kind of assessment as very narrow, but on closer view it may yet have its value. After all, you greet each day from your own point of view and with your own sense of good or bad. If you feel sick, you will feel that it's not a good day, even though everyone may tell you that it is; but if you can face it with equanimity and confidence, it is an altogether different matter.

You will remember that my youth was spent in a country where anti-Semitism was all around me, and therefore my dad's assessment of the day-by-day situation was rarely positive. Like most other people, I have not forgotten the lessons of my youth, and subconsciously the judgment of my dad still whispers its cogent message into my ear.

When we treat the weakest elements in society well, give them respect and an opportunity to live decently, we are doing what we ought to do and our society deserves a positive mark. But if we do not, history will judge us as having failed and missed our opportunity for doing good.

Close to home

"I am more and more afraid to go places because of the terrorists. What I'm most afraid of is that the Palestinians are going to win the war and then we will need to go away from Israel and we won't have any other place to live."

So says a nine-year-old Israeli boy in Jerusalem when asked about how he sees the conflict with the Palestinians. His name is Etye and he happens to be my son. Like all Israelis past the age of five or six, Etye feels threatened by the terrorist war launched by the Palestinians against Israel. Since it erupted in September 2000, no one has escaped its devastating impact, not even children.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

The other day, I sat down with my three kids and asked each one separately about their concerns. They spoke in a way only children can, in voices that reflect the fears of young Israelis.

"It's become really scary here," my oldest daughter Aviv told me. She is 14 years old and a student at Jerusalem's Ziv Junior High. "I am afraid of being in public places. I feel I have to always keep my eyes open. I never used to look at so many people in public like I do now. If I am in a crowded place, I look to see if there is a strange person, anyone suspicious, especially if it is an Arab, and I worry what might happen."

As she speaks, the war's sobering effect on her life hits home. For the past 20 months, at the insistence of my wife and me, Aviv has had to forsake countless outings to public places that we feared might be targets for Palestinian terrorists. At times, it is as if we have our kids under house arrest. For their friends, it is a similar story.

Aviv looks at me and continues matter-of-factly. "When I'm in certain places in the city with lots of people, I always think there could be a terrorist planning an explosion. Something could happen to me and if I don't die, I will be badly wounded and handicapped forever. That's why I try not go out very much anymore."

In normal times, one of the great wonders about raising children in Israel is the freedom and security kids have here. They can play outside, go places and even ride buses with little parental supervision due to the low level of street crime. Not any more.

Since the hostilities erupted, the terrorist onslaught has shaken the country to its core. It has affected the way people live. The obscene atrocities and heart-wrenching tragedies have been traumatic for adults, let alone children.

If only we could spare our children exposure to such acts of evil and savagery, at least until they were older. No such luck in news-saturated Israel, where major stories receive blanket coverage in the media and fuel heated discussions in any gathering of two adults or more.

"The situation today is very depressing," says Shani, my 12-year-old middle daughter, a Grade 6 student at Ramat Sharett School. "With so many Jews being killed and so many people hating us, it reminds me a bit of the Shoah. I am scared it's going to become even more dangerous."

Shani describes her fears with a certain innocence, without realizing the full implication of her words. "Now when I hear of a new terrorist attack, I am worried that if it continues to get worse it will really become another Shoah. Even though there are a lot of Jews, there are even more Arabs and they can do a Shoah. I'm really scared we'll be forced into a ghetto and we won't have food and a lot of people will die. Actually, we do have a bit of the Shoah already. Arafat is the new Hitler."

To children in Israel, the terror that captures the headlines around the world, is neither an abstraction nor a statistic. It is a sombre part of their young lives and we are helpless to fully shelter them from it.

The dangerous allure of NGOs

The term "non-governmental organization" (NGO) usually evokes images of altruism and compassion, particularly among people who believe that states, and the politicians who run them, are flawed and their actions need to be tempered. NGOs are supposed to speak up for the weak and down trodden and promote the rights of individuals and minorities.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

In this spirit, thousands of NGOs have sprung up, concentrating on environmental issues, human rights, humanitarian relief and campaigns against dangerous weapons such as landmines and small arms. These groups are well funded and use their generous budgets to promote themselves and their causes. The largest and richest NGOs, such as Greenpeace, Amnesty International, and Human Rights Watch, have become well-known brand names, and the major figures in these groups are more powerful than many government officials.

At the same time, in many cases, these organizations have themselves added to injustice and duplicity, particularly in the Middle East. Like the United Nations, many prominent NGOs have become captured by the pro-Palestinian and anti-Israel lobby. NGOs played a major role in last year's infamous Durban anti-racism conference that was supposed to fight racism but ended up contributing to hatred of Israel and anti-Semitism. Similarly, the myths of the "Jenin massacre" were propelled by NGOs such as Human Rights Watch and Amnesty International, and their biased and unverified reports were picked up and repeated by the media.

To make matters worse, much of the funding for these "non-governmental" organizations comes from governments. Allocations to NGOs allow politicians and officials to promote their private agendas through the back door. The practice is widespread in Europe, Canada and Australia as a means of increasing visibility and impact in the UN and international organizations, as well as Third World countries. For example, the governments of Norway and the European Union have attempted to influence Israeli politics by providing millions of dollars to the Israeli left and individuals such as Yossi Beilin and Uri Savir. Many of the rallies and newspaper ads supporting radical Israeli politicians and policies are paid for by NGOs funded by Norway and the European Union.

While the Canadian government has become more careful about supporting Palestinian victimization myths, scrutiny of NGOs working in this area lags behind. Canada has funded the International Commission to Ban Landmines (ICBL), a group affiliated with Human Rights Watch, whose reports and activities are also used by Palestinians and their supporters to engage in anti-Israeli propaganda, instead of co-operation to reduce the dangers of landmines.

Ottawa also funds the International Crisis Group (ICG), which has been active in the Balkans and has now taken on the Middle East. The work of the ICG could be done as well or better by universities and think-tanks, and as such, government funding for the ICG is hard to justify. In addition, its Middle East project is being led by Robert Malley, who served as a low-level official in the Clinton administration, and since then, has promoted his career by pushing a version of the negotiations between former prime minister Ehud Barak and Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat from Camp David to Taba that absolves Arafat and the Palestinians of any responsibility for their breakdown. This revisionist history has been rejected by all the U.S. government officials involved, including former president Bill Clinton and Dennis Ross, and by Barak and the Israelis, but is, of course, embraced by the Palestinians and Arabs.

While the ICG report on the Middle East has some interesting ideas, it is tainted by the inclusion of Malley's private agenda and the myth of "agreements" and "frameworks" based on the failed and now irrelevant Camp David and Taba talks. Although the report may be based on false premises, it is not illegitimate. However, such blatantly partisan agendas and distorted versions of history should not receive funding from Canada or any other government.

While these are relatively minor examples, they serve to illustrate the hidden political and ideological agendas of the NGOs. The halo worn by these groups has begun to grow thin, and their activities around the world are coming under greater scrutiny. The role of NGOs needs urgent reexamination, particularly in the highly propagandized realm of Middle East politics.

The Kirshner File

Goldwyn and Berlin defined American culture

Popular American culture was formed on the anvil of numerous influences. But if I had to pick two individuals whose input was disproportionate, Samuel Goldwyn – the independent Hollywood producer – and Irving Berlin – the legendary composer – would be on top of my list.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Goldwyn and Berlin, both immigrants from the Russian empire, were purveyors of the storied American dream.

Through the medium of movies and songs, they helped shape the values of a heterogeneous society.

It may seem ironic that two Jewish boys whose first language was not even English, and who were born in the Pale of Settlement, would be exemplars of mainstream American mores.

Yet, on second thought, their respective lives were in keeping with the polyglot, secular nature of America.

What hammered home these notions were two television documentaries, Goldwyn and Irving Berlin, broadcast recently on the PBS and A&E networks.

Goldwyn, whose original name was Shmuel Gelbfisz, was the son of a chassidic Jew whose father bought and sold second-hand furniture. When he was only 16, he left Poland, leaving behind his widowed mother in Warsaw. His intention was to immigrate to America, the so-called goldenne medine.

The route would take him to New York City via England and Canada. Being indigent, he walked most of the way. In London, where he remained for about two years, his relatives urged him to play down his Jewish background, a notion he took under consideration.

In 1898, he sailed to Halifax, and a year later, in a snowstorm, he literally walked to the United States. That kind of courage and determination would keep him in good stead.

Goldwyn began as a sweeper in an upstate New York glove factory. Upwardly mobile, he was soon a $3-a-week glovemaker and thence vice-president of sales.

He went into the fledgling movie business after seeing a western film in Manhattan. His partners were Jesse Lasky, his brother-in-law, and Louis B. Mayer, a former junk dealer. With an investment of $45,000, they produced Squaw Man, the first Hollywood feature. The year was in 1913. The director was Cecil B. De Mille.

As a result of a merger, the company became known as Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. But Goldwyn was never part of it, having fallen out with Lasky and Mayer.

With $250,000 in borrowed funds, he established Samuel Goldwyn Inc. The movies were distributed by United Artists, founded by Charlie Chaplin and Mary Pickford. Not by chance, Goldwyn's first movie was a comedy about bickering partners.

His first talkie, Bulldog Drummond, earned more at the box office than all his silent films. He was on his way.

Goldwyn, a ruthless businessman and a dictatorial boss, had immense respect for talent and valued excellence. Indeed, "The Goldwyn touch" would be synonymous with unsurpassed production qualities. And yet, as a person, he was widely considered uncultured and uncouth. His malapropisms, such as "Include me out," are famous in the industry.

All in all, he churned out 80 films, among which were Wuthering Heights (his favourite), The Little Foxes (with Betty Davis), The Pride of the Yankees, The Best Years of Our Lives (which won the Academy Award for best picture) and Guys and Dolls. His last movie, Porgy and Bess, won three Oscars in 1959 but was a financial flop.

Scott Berg, Goldwyn's biographer, claims that Goldwyn, who died in 1974, played down his Jewishness. Goldwyn's wife, Frances Howard, was a Catholic, and their son, Samuel Jr., was raised as a Christian.

Despite this, Goldwyn does not appear to have been a classical self-hating Jew. He hired Eddie Cantor in Whoopee, a 1930 musical Hollywood moguls had rejected because of their reluctance to highlight a Jewish actor in a starring role.

During the 1930s, when the Boston financier Joseph Kennedy, the father of John F. Kennedy, urged Goldwyn to remove Jewish actors from his films, he refused. Later, in the 1940s, Goldwyn took a chance on the Jewish comedian Danny Kaye, who, due to his nose, photographed badly. Striking a compromise, Goldwyn asked Kaye to dye his hair blond.

Irving Berlin, whose father Moses Beilin was a cantor, could play the piano in only one key – F sharp – and never learned to read music. Yet Berlin, who died in 1989 at the age 101, was probably the greatest composer in American history.

Samuel Goldwyn

He published some 800 songs, 282 of which were in the top 10 and 35 of which were No. 1 hits. Among his enduring classics are God Bless America, White Christmas and Easter Parade.

"He has no place in American music," one critic wrote. "He is American music."

Irving Berlin with Ginger Rogers and Fred Astaire

Berlin, the subject of a fine biography by Edward Jablonski, published by Fitzhenry & Whiteside recently under the title of Irving Berlin: American Troubador, sold newspapers and was a busker and singing waiter in New York City's Lower East Side before he broke into the music business.

Writing his first song – Marie From Sunny Italy – in 1907, Berlin never looked back. Just three years later, he whipped off Alexander's Ragtime Band, which swept the nation.

He was only 23.

Devastated by his first wife's death, he fell into a funk. From his grief, the hugely successful song, When I Lost You, emerged.

In 1918, he wrote Oh, I Hate to Get Up in the Morning, which became a standard. In the same year, he composed God Bless America, which he had left in a drawer for 20 years. The United States' second national anthem, God Bless America was an immediate hit. Kate Smith sang it shortly after Germany's invasion of Czechoslovakia. Anti-Semites were less than thrilled by the fact that a Jewish composer had written it.

In 1919, after A Pretty Girl is like a Melody was released, he incorporated himself. It was a wise move, giving him rights to all his songs. So when Berlin lost his savings in the 1929 crash, he did not lose a single night's sleep. His songs tided him over.

Three of his finest songs were inspired by personal tragedy and joy. He wrote All Alone after his girlfriend and love-of-his-life, Ellin MacKay, a Long Island socialite, was banished to Europe by her anti-Semitic father, a wealthy Catholic businessman. And he composed Always after he married her, and Blue Skies after their first child was born.

Berlin was in the habit of filing away songs he deemed inferior, and two of them, Say It Ain't So and How Deep is the Ocean, like God Bless America, were enormous hits.

In common with many of his fellow composers, Berlin wrote for the movies. His initial foray into film was a bust, but in 1935, he hit the jackpot with Top Hat, which yielded no less than 12 songs, including Cheek to Cheek and Isn't This a Lovely Day (to be Caught in the Rain)? In 1942, he wrote the sonorous White Christmas for the movie Holiday Inn.

Berlin's Broadway songs, from I Got the Sun in the Morning to There's No Business Like Show Business, are also the stuff of magic and legend. Like Goldwyn, Berlin knew how to tap into the American psyche.

Together, but separately, they produced wonderful movies and wrote amazing songs that define the essence of American culture.

Learning styles vary among home schools school. (Though universities receive government funding for homeschooled students, some require an OSSD from their applicants. Contact each institution for more information.)

Leia, who studies ballet seven days a week, is currently attending Avondale, an alternative high school in Toronto, and is taking two courses online with the Virtual School (a Toronto District School Board program). Strassfeld took Leia out of Jewish day school and began homeschooling her so her daughter could attend dance classes and rehearsals, Strassfeld says. They started it as a one-year trial experiment but, "once we started, we never wanted to go back.

"We have such an established system of Jewish schools and such a commitment to the concept of formal Jewish education that it is a radical move to homeschool," says Strassfeld, who has a master's degree in dance education and works at the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education. But "there's only so much [schools] can bend and weave for individuals."

Each homeschooling setup is different – learning styles vary from a strict adherence to the provincial curriculum to "unschooling," a term generally described as an open learning process focused on a child's interests.

Some Jewish families incorporate Limudei Kodesh studies while others do not, either because other learning is considered more important or because, as Strassfeld says, there is no such curriculum available to homeschoolers.

Strassfeld used a curriculum with English, literature, social studies and history. Leia also read a lot of books, had a tutor for math, science, Chumash and Hebrew, and learned Judaic studies with her father, Rabbi Steven Saltzman, for a short time.

Leia says she prefers homeschooling to traditional schooling. "[The information] stays with you more when you learn things in an interesting way and you learn it properly as opposed to having someone read to you from a textbook or write notes on a board," she says.

Chaya Malka Solomon, on the other hand, is not sure whether she likes learning at home or at school better.

"It's a hard decision," Chaya Malka, 11, says. While she cites several advantages to learning at home, she adds that a downside was that she didn't know many other kids.

Critics of homeschooling might think Chaya Malka's experience proves the notion that kids who aren't in school aren't properly socialized, but "[that's] the biggest myth that there is," says Solomon.

True socialization occurs when people who are not neccesarily the same age and who may have different or similar interests get together because of a common interest and discuss what they choose and for how long without guidance, she says.

Though her kids went through a period of adjustment when they moved from home to school, says Solomon, they soon excelled academically and socially. What was more of a problem for her family was the lack of support.

Students face many challenges

"I did not find, when we were homeschooling, that there was much support Jewishly… There were many challenges and at times it felt very lonely."

But in the end, she says, the compromises were worth it. "I'm not lambasting any one particular school. I'm not looking to say that institutionalized education – for those who choose it – isn't their option… But I feel just as strongly that homeschooling should be a viable choice as well in terms of options for Jewish education in this city.

"We could choose who we wanted as role models for our children…If [my children] learned one thing…it's that there are choices that you can make, and not all the choices fit the system."

If Solomon found homeschooling in the Jewish community lonely, Daryl Vernon – who began homeschooling 20 years ago and is still homeschooling today – found it even more so.

Vernon started "when there was no support" and the "school boards were adversarial," he says. When he pulled his oldest son, Eric, out from a Jewish day school, the family was living on a farm in Kleinberg. Today, they live in the city and all four children have been homeschooled for at least several years each. Eric, 22, is currently studying on a full scholarship at a university in England; Rachel, 18, and Micah, 15, are in public school; and Zachary, 10, has never been to school.

Homeschooling brings "immense rewards," he says, adding that schools as we know them have only been in existence for a few generations. "Children will bloom by themselves. They're being potted and they don't need to be."

Naomi Hecht, who has homeschooled her four children off and on since they were at junior-high age, says her children also bloomed when they stopped going to school.

"They couldn't comprehend the meanness of the other kids," Hecht says. "I remember how excited they had been when they started out. I wanted them to keep that enthusiasm."

Now, three of Hecht's children – Chai, 18; Tikva, 17; and Razi, 13 (Dodi-Lee, 20, is in college in New York City) – study with her husband and each other at his office each morning and work on their Independent Learning Centre (ILC) courses each afternoon. Hecht, a writer, works nearby so she can be available if they need her during the day or if they just want to talk.

Though Hecht and each of these other parents began teaching their children at home for different reasons – whether because they were having trouble academically, needed a more challenging curriculum, had learning disabilities, were involved in activities that require a flexible schedule or were simply not thriving in the school environment – they all agree that homeschooling addresses a child's uniqueness in a way that schools do not and that that distinction makes all the difference.

Life is "wide open," Vernon says. "Every child is different and every year in a child's life is different. Every child has a gift. You just have to listen to it, you have to be there for it."

"Everyone has something of value that no one else has," Hecht adds. "If you don't tell your kids that, they won't see the poetry in the world."

Dan donates $15 million to U of T faculty

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Hungarian-born entrepreneur, philanthropist and founder of one of Canada's largest manufacturers of generic drugs, Leslie Dan was honoured recently with the renaming of the pharmacy faculty at the University of Toronto.

The Leslie L. Dan Faculty of Pharmacy will be housed in the Leslie L. Dan Pharmacy Building, which is to be completed in 2005. The new building will increase the number of graduate pharmacy students from 120 to 240.

World-renowned British architect Sir Norman Foster has been selected to design the new building. Construction will take place on a 15,000-square-metre site at the northwest quadrant of the College Street-Queen's Park Crescent intersection – the site now occupied by greenhouses built in 1931.

In expressing appreciation for a "munificent" gift of $15 million, University of Toronto president Robert J. Birgeneau said, "This is an exceptional gesture of kindness that will forever link your name with the largest faculty of its kind in the nation, and ultimately benefit the entire Canadian pharmaceutical industry.

"It is gifts like yours that help the University of Toronto maintain its standing as the best institution of higher education in the country."

Dan told The CJN there is a "dire shortage" of pharmacists in the country as more and more pharmacies are opening and remaining open for longer hours.

"The large chains and the Ontario College of Pharmacy, the licensing body of the government, are pressing the faculty of pharmacy to increase the number of graduates as the pharmacies are grossly understaffed.

"I am concerned that people will not be properly served because of the shortage of pharmacists," said Dan.

When asked about his choice of the pharmacy faculty for this donation, Dan said, "The U of T gave me a pharmacy profession and if I am successful, it is only fair and proper that I should contribute to the growth of the university, specifically the faculty of pharmacy."

Prof. Wayne Hindmarsh, dean of the faculty of pharmacy, says he regards Dan as an inspirational example for the faculty's students. "He's one of our graduates who has been a real credit to the pharmacy profession," he said.

Dan, who spent World War II hiding in Budapest, came to Canada in 1947 as a young war refugee with little knowledge of English and only a few dollars in his pocket.

He attended Harbord Collegiate and worked as a lumberjack and a waiter to put himself through university, earning a bachelor's degree from U of T's faculty of pharmacy in 1954 and an MBA at the university in 1959.

In 1965, Dan founded Novopharm Limited, a producer of high-quality moderately priced pharmaceuticals.

Two years ago, Dan sold Novopharm to Teva Pharmaceutical Company, an Israeli firm that operates worldwide. He remains chair of the Canadian operation, as well as of Novopharm's two Hungarian subsidiaries, Human and Humanpharma Hungary. He is also on the board of Teva Israel.

Dan heads a family-owned company founded in 1990, Veventia Biotech (formerly Novopharm Biotech) – a company dedicated to finding more effective medications to fight cancer.

"We are very optimistic that we shall be successful with our research," he said.

Dan has received numerous awards and honours. In 1995, he was honoured at the 47th annual Negev Dinner and in 1997, U of T granted him an honorary doctorate of science. In 1996, he received the orders of Canada and Ontario.

Lecturer to look at a literal study of the Torah

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Lecturer and educator Arna Poupko Fisher will speak at Baycrest Terrace, May 27, 8 pm., in a program sponsored by the Mekorot Institute of Torah Study for Women.

Mekorot, now completing its third year, offers a program of Jewish learning with the goal of making the full range of traditional Jewish texts accessible to its students.

It offers its almost 160 students three year-long, text based, weekly courses covering Bible, prophets, midrash and Talmud, as well as five mini-courses dealing with holidays, Jewish philosophy and Jewish legal authority.

Poupko Fisher, who spoke at Mekorot's inaugural event three years ago, will speak on The Bible as Literature: The Beauty of the Simple Text.

She spoke to The CJN from her home in Cincinnati, Ohio, where, starting in the fall, she will be an adjunct professor in the University of Cincinnati's Jewish studies department.

She is also a faculty member of the Wexner Heritage Foundation, a program that educates Jewish communal leaders in the history, thought, traditions and contemporary challenges of the Jewish people, as well as the Wexner Graduate Fellows program, and has taught at both the University of Toronto and McGill University.

Poupko Fisher said that in her lecture, she will look at ways one can read Torah "in order to glean greater appreciation of the beauty and Godly precision of the text.

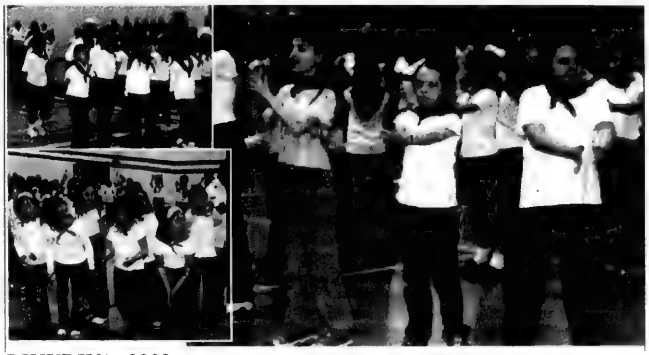
"Through a careful consideration of the plain, literal reading of the Torah, one can identify repetitive metaphors and motifs which teach and communicate exceptionally profound ideals," she said.

In reading the Torah, "we tend to emphasize midrashic interpretations while somewhat ignoring the literary simplicity of the narrative," Poupko Fisher said.

"For example, why does the Torah choose to tell particular events in the way in which it does? Why do we find repetitive language or motifs?"

In this way, she said, a literary read of the text is not in any way religiously threatening. "In fact, it can become a foundation for a deeper belief in the divine origin of the text."

For information, call the Mekorot Institute of Torah Study for Women at 416-398-1510.



RIKUDIYA 2002: This theme of this year's Rikudiya, directed by Teme Kernerman, was Tikvah L'Shalom (Hope for Peace). About 200 students from 12 schools participated in the program, held at York University. The schools were: Associated Hebrew Day School, Kamin campus; Associated Hebrew Day School, Danilack/Posluns campus; Beit Sefer Solel; Bialik Hebrew Day School; Darchei Noam Religious School; Holy Blossom Hebrew School; Leo Baeck Hebrew Day School; She'arim Hebrew Day School; Toronto Heschel School; United Synagogue Day School Bathurst campus; United Synagogue Day School, Bayview campus; and United Synagogue Day School, Richmond Hill campus. The guest performances were by the Chai Dancers and the Nirkoda Israeli Dancers Alumni.

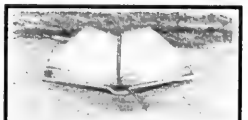
Jewish Life

Giving Shlomo Shmulevitz his due

By RABBI MARK FRIEDMAN

Recently, we witnessed the bestowal of two of the best-known awards, the Oscars for film and the Pulitzer Prizes for literature and journalism. Of course, one of the benefits of receiving awards is the sense of recognition that accompanies them. Receiving such an award is an acknowledgement of excellence and achievement.



Rabbinic Reflections

Recognition is also a factor in the festival that we celebrated last week, Shavuot. Sadly, of all the festivals in the Jewish calendar, Shavuot is one of the least celebrated and recognized. Perhaps the lack of a concrete symbol akin to the sukkah and the matzah accounts for this, as the festival's main theme, the giving of the Torah and God's revelation to Moses upon Mount Sinai, is certainly significant and worthy of recognition.

It's in this spirit that I wish to relate the story of a Yiddish song and its composition. The song is titled A Brivele der Mamen, and it touched a very tender place in the the hearts of many young Jews who had left their homes and families in Europe for a better life in America and became an immediate hit among the Jewish immigrant population. The song was also sung on the Yiddish stage and eventually became the theme song of a Yiddish movie.

It was composed by a man named Shlomo Shmulevitz in 1912. It became very popular and was sung by mothers in both Europe and America. Everybody made money on the song, except Shmulevitz. When the movie A Brivele der Mamen was brought to the United States from Poland, where it was filmed, Shmulevitz's name was not mentioned.

Outraged, Shmulevitz sent a bitter letter to the Yiddish press, titled "A Protest." Shmulevitz claimed that many people knew the truth, yet no voices were raised in protest. He wrote that even the press, including the editors of the three New York Yiddish newspapers, knew of this situation, but remained silent. The papers ran advertisements for the film, which said another man had written the song. The movie was publicized in New York with large posters and the song's composer was identified as one A. Elstein in both the posters and in the press. This was, Shmulevitz wrote, a public injustice and embarrassment for him.

He claimed that this was the second time he had been robbed of this song. The publisher paid him $25 for it and then made thousands of dollars on it but gave neither acknowledgment nor royalties to Shmulevitz. He wrote that he was not a well man and had a weak heart. He lived alone, among strangers, in a very small room and spent his days peddling his two books of musical compositions. Shmulevitz died without redress and without recognition.

What is so sad is that Shmulevitz's protest was justified; many people knew he had composed the song, but for some reason, a conspiracy appears to have existed and none of those who knew acknowledged its true composer. I wish to rectify this situation. May this article and the words of the song he wrote serve to honour Shmulevitz and may we accord recognition to a man who never received it during his lifetime.

Here are some of his words:

My child, my comfort, you are going across distant seas.

Arrive in good health and write each week to ease your mother's worries.

Write a letter soon, my child.

Your mother will read your letter and be comforted.

Ease her pain, her bitter heart, refresh her spirit.

Seeing beneath the surface

By ELLIOT MALAMET

The Talmud (Baba Bathra; 73B) tells a story of Rabba bar Bar Hanna, who relates that "once he and his companions were travelling on board a ship and saw a fish whose back was covered with sand out of which grew grass. Thinking this fish was dry land, they went up on it and cooked on its back. When, however, its back was heated it turned over and had it not been for a passing ship they would have been drowned."

There are many ways to interpret this story, but what seems glaring is the portrait of a world which seems stable but is not, seems to be one thing and turns out to be radically different. We believe, especially in modernity, in the solidity of the material world, in what we can touch and see and evaluate scientifically, in the houses we build and the cars we drive. But all is temporary, and a life can turn around in a flash. Dry land overturns and we are left hanging on for dear life, if not, as the parable suggests, for the lifeboat of Torah that is nearby.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

But the implication of the Gemarah is not just a negative one. The overturning of our physical world is also a sign of the emergence of a spiritual world, a truth that we often try to deny or simply pay little heed. But sometimes in crisis, this other world ruptures the fabric of our own daily lives and presents itself as having been the basis of our being all along.

This can be described by a term from German theatre – doppelbodigkeit – literally "having a double floor." The ordinary world, previously perceived as massive, is now seen as tenuously put together, like a stage set made of cardboard, full of holes, easily collapsed into unreality. One now understands that this other reality has been there all along – on "another floor," so to speak. In other words, the experience of doppelbodigkeit throws a new light on the familiar facts of ordinary experience. Our forefather Jacob has this doppelbodigkeit encounter when he dreams of angels going up and down a ladder, and notes upon awakening that "surely God was in this place and I did not know."

It is quite possible that the current unfolding of events – in Israel and around the world – is an opportunity to see beneath the surface of our lives and think more deeply than we usually care to about the meaning and destiny of our existence.

The Vilna Gaon states that the punishment for wasted words in the afterlife is called "the cup of the slingshot." The soul that tossed words about unthinkingly in this world is flung from one place to another in the next world. Before it can arrive at its destination, it is jerked in the opposite direction. Hence there is the experience of constantly travelling and never getting anywhere, a life which moved through the world but wasted its creative energies. May our current troubles propel us in the right direction, and allow the Jewish people to rededicate ourselves to our mission as a moral light and an ethical force.

Jewish Life

Uniting pleasure with truth

This Horizon and Beyond: Poems Selected and New*, Nancy-Gay Rotstein, McClelland & Stewart, 2001, $19.99.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Not too long ago, when a novelist or dramatist wrote with a flame of the highest inspiration, his or her work was said to be "touched by poetry." It was widely believed that no literary genre was closer to the divine then poetry. For Robert Browning, poetry means putting the infinite within the finite, and Matthew Arnold spoke for many when he explained that poetry is simply the most beautiful, impressive and widely affective way of saying things.

Unhappily, however much poetry was exalted in the past, the sad truth is that contemporary poetry – outside a small and enthusiastic circle – is scarcely read. This is sad, because not all modern poetry is difficult or obscure. Much of it still speaks to us if we take the trouble to pause and listen. Today, as in the past, poetry is still the art of putting words and ideas together to unite pleasure with truth.

Nancy-Gay Rotstein is a Toronto poet whose work has been internationally recognized and acclaimed. Her new book contains selections from her three previous books, as well as poems never before published.

In his ample foreword to this book Irving Layton is unstinting in his praise. "Rotstein's poems show her awareness of time and eternity and how they condition each other. Rotstein, like all enduring poets, is aware of the transcendental and eternal existing side by side, and how they condition each other to the eternal discomfort and perplexity of human beings."

Nancy-Gay Rotstein

The many poems of Jewish interest are warm and appealing, neither banal nor unfathomable. Masada evokes a sense of both yesterday and today in a strange amalgam. "The sun scours/ the ancient rocks/ baking its limestone/ dust./ Birds weave over/ reconstructed ruins/ witnesses to time./ Silence, sweet and still/ screams to be remembered/ as skeletons of bravery/ lie buried under/ burnt stone–/ children with mothers/ men linked in faith./ Now paratroopers/ march over crusty stone/ and take their oath/ to remember."

The Guide brings to life the familiar Israeli polymath who is able to joke "in five languages/ English, Arabic, and Italian./ German when necessary." And who "opens doors./ waits in marble lobbies./ explains history tirelessly./ In his pocket, a Gun/ on his arm, a Number/ in his heart, Steel."

In The Visitor the reader is given a rare glimpse of Alfred Dreyfus at a bagel bar. He is a revenant, an unfelt and undemanding presence. "He sat on/ a tri-coloured chair/ a century-traveller/ unseen among/ the Sunday brunchers." History imposes no obligation upon the living as "Unnoted, Dreyfus walks/ through the double-glass door/ and disappears./ Tears pock his/ prison-pallored face./ a ghost upon the/ haunted streets."

This Horizon and Beyond is a luminous exploration of the ambit where history, impressions, memory and imagination pass into one another and through one another. How precious to be able to transform the uncertainty and emptiness of life into human potential and hope.

Jewish weddings & the Net

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

You're getting married. Mazel tov!

Although this is an incredible and unique experience for you and your beloved, some of the questions and problems you are facing have been faced by many other couples. Luckily, some of them have shared their experiences on the World Wide Web. Today, a look at some Jewish wedding sites and insights.

If you have a question, there's a good chance it's been asked at Jewish.com. More than 70 questions deal with everything from proposals and engagements to the ketubah and the ceremony. For example, to the question, "Is one allowed to propose marriage during Shabbos?" Rabbi Leibie Sternberg says that Jewish law "specifically permits one to arrange betrothals on Shabbos, with the caveat that no financial matters or obligations be discussed. Making a shidduch is deemed a Heavenly matter, and such are [it is] permitted on Shabbos." [http://www.jewish.com/askarabbi/Lifecycle_Events/Weddings/]

I particularly like the initiative displayed by Kyra Schuster and Michael Scheinberg. Kyra and Mike got married in October 1998 (after having met on the Internet!). The couple has put together an informative and informal guide to Jewish weddings that you can read online and download, too. Here's a sample:

Question: Why is the Groom wearing a white robe? Did he forget his tux?

Answer: No he didn't forget his tux. It's what we call a kittel. You see, the wedding day is a personal Yom Kippur (Day of Atonement) for the bride and groom. On this holiday, one wears white to symbolize cleanliness and purity. The white clothing is an extension of this purity. Besides, at a black-tie affair, it's the best way to point out the bride and groom... [http://www.kyra-mike.net/jewish. html]

Ohr Somayach's Ask the Rabbi feature has addressed several wedding questions over the years. You can find out about the traditions guiding a child who wants to attend the second wedding of a parent, why the bride and groom are lifted up on chairs after the wedding and what to do with the glass broken during the wedding ceremony: "There is no problem with throwing it away in the garbage. Although it was used in a religious ceremony, it itself is not a holy article. I've heard that some have the custom to save the glass and make jewelry from it." [http://www.ohr.edu/web/index/askw.htm]

Eliezer Segal is a professor of western religions at the University of Calgary. His Web site is full of thought-provoking articles about Jewish life and history and things they never taught you at Jewish school. His section on Jewish Weddings traces how the chupah has evolved from the Garden of Eden to its use today. Segal examines the ketubah for clues to its ancient values and he explains the tradition of holding Jewish weddings beneath the stars [http://www.acs.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Shokel/Weddings_Index.html].

The Union of American Hebrew Congregations has a Web site that outlines its views on marriage and intermarriage. There are questions and answers about interfaith ceremonies and interracial Jewish marriages. [http://uahc.org/ask/questions.shtml]

If you don't know an "aufruf" from a "bedeken," there are several sites that will help you with the terminology, such as as AllThingsJewish [http://www.allthingsjewish.com/library.asp?Subject ID=84]. If you are still looking for more information, don't miss Kyra and Mike's links to other Jewish wedding sites [http://www.kyra-mike.net/links.html].

Miriam Weinstein has advice for a difficult problem: what to do when you are divorced and your children are getting married. She quotes Rabbi Myron Geller of Temple Ahavat Achim in Gloucester, Mass.: "The parents need to focus on the fact that the wedding is not the time to deal with their own conflicts. While it lends itself to acting out their continuing struggle, hostility and anger, this is not the proper setting to even scores, settle accounts, justify themselves... Just like we're supposed to honour our parents, doing the proper thing for our children is a mitzvah." [http://www.jflmail.com/articles/1802.html]

When you are done reading about the hows and whys of Jewish weddings, you may be ready for some articles about what to expect after the wedding. The Aish Hatorah Web site has sections dealing with with key issues like intimacy, commitment and trust. [http://www.aish.com/family/marriage/].

So once again, mazel tov, and happy reading!

Israel, Jews and the left

By JORDY CUMMINGS

Can it be that it was all so simple? In 1948, upon Israel's founding, the international left – including Arab communist and socialist parties, particularly in Egypt – was supportive of Israel. After the nakba (Arabic for catastrophe, referring to the founding of Israel), Marxists, even within the Arab world, were prepared to accept Israel's right to exist within secure borders.

Guest Voice

The reasoning was that a socialist, labour-based country – Israel – would rub off on the repressive "Islamo-fascist" regimes that dominated the region.

Indeed, it was the British-funded Muslim Brotherhood, ostensibly an Islamic charity, that provided the basis for Arab anti-Semitism, as well as a means to push Egyptian leader Gamal Abdel Nasser to the right.

Also, it was the Americans (and particularly former U.S. president Jimmy Carter's National Security Council adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski), in their brilliance, who later decided to create an International Islamic Fundamentalist Brigade – later to be called Al Qaeda – in order to defeat communism in Afghanistan.

Aside from some American corporations, international big business has always relied more strongly on iron-fisted Wahabis – the inventors of what we call fundamentalist Islam, who essentially run Saudi Arabia – than on Eretz Yisrael.

Why is it, then, that the international left seems to be so pro-Palestinian, leading many hitherto left-leaning Jews to abandon their progressive affiliations? Why is it that an innocuous Naderite research group like QPIRG-McGill has been lumped in with "extremists" (as was the case in a recent issue of The CJN)? Much of it has to do with a misunderstanding of our position on this issue.

Even the most ardent leftist critics of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's actions do not deny Israel's right to exist within secure borders. It is just that we cannot square Sharon's appointing of transfer-mongers to his government and his stated desire to destroy the Oslo peace process with our support for Israel. Therefore, like Americans who saw it as their patriotic duty to speak the truth while their nation was involved in the horrendous Vietnam War, we see it as our responsibility, as Jews and as internationalists, to speak out against Sharon.

The charge that the left is anti-Semitic is ludicrous, especially given that those in the vanguard of many, if not most progressive social movements, are disproportionately Jewish. Indeed, the group of non-violent activists who recently occupied MP Irwin Cotler's office in Montreal included more than one Israeli, as well as quite a few Palestinians.

Furthermore, as more Palestinians and Arabs become involved in leftist and internationalist politics, it will bring a far preferable mode of political thinking to the Middle East than that of the Wahabis or the Baathists. (The latter are the worst anti-Semites in the region, growing out of what was supposed to be an Arab socialist movement into something heavily influenced by Nazi expatriates in the 1950s. Iraq's Saddam Hussein and the late Syrian leader Hafez Assad are Baathists.)

On the other hand, as many Jews close ranks to support Sharon, there has been a tremendous growth of openly expressed Islamophobia and anti-Arab racism, if not Meir Kahane-derived attitudes, not only toward Palestinians but toward such "self-hating Jews" as Rabbi Michael Lerner, the editor of Tikkun magazine, Israeli author Amos Oz and Labour MK Yossi Beillin.

Israel and Palestine are but a small part of the international left's current agenda, which can be simplified in the great catch phrase "Another world is possible." Unlike the media-created label of "anti-globalization," the left aims to globalize social justice, environmentalism, human rights and labour movements to eventually be able to counter the international power of corporations. The nation state has declined in power over the last half-century, while big business acts ever more globally. Anyone confused about the current global corporate agenda can look at victims of the Enron debacle, not only in Houston, but all through India, where it was a regular Enron practice to bribe state officials to build huge dams that are environmentally destructive, while nearly 100 million Indians are without a safe supply of water.

As the world faces a huge resurgence in anti-Semitism, both of the fascist LePenite and the Islamist variety, it is important that members of the Jewish community understand one another – a sort of macro-level shalom bayit.

It is of course also important for us to understand that Jean-Marie LePen in France and other Euro-fascists are as anti-Arab as they are anti-Semitic. We Semites – Muslim, Jewish and Christian – must find ways of working together globally.

My aim in writing this opinion piece is not to propagandize or proselytize. Rather, it is rather to explain to my community why so many of us are involved in internationalism. I expect that the knee-jerk responses to me will be visceral, just as they were to Baruch Spinoza, who was thrown out of the Amsterdam Jewish community for his views. Yet, a compass is far more important when it is inconvenient. I believe that history will vindicate my position, while the same cannot be said for those who blindly support Sharon.

Jewish students honoured at JCS's awards night

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The challenge for Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto is to provide, above all, a sense of pride in being Jewish on campus, said the organization's director at JCS's annual awards night, held recently at York University.

"For students this is a frightening time. They're being challenged to defend Israel and who they are as Jews," said Zac Kaye at the otherwise festive event. "Some students are conversant with the issues, but sadly only a minority."

Among the positive stories recounted were those of Ilana Aisen and Craig Byers, who told of their "engagement," not to each other, but rather in JCS. Aisen has become involved in Israel-related and religious programming, following a life-changing trip to El Salvador with the organization.

Byers, who also went on the trip and who is in the process of converting to Judaism, said he has found community at the University of Toronto's Jewish Student Union.

"Hopefully we'll engage more and more students [who] will become our future leaders," said Larry Sonenberg, JCS president. He is hopeful, he added, that before long the awards night will be held at the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Life, the Jewish student centre being built just off the University of Toronto campus.

In his tribute to Michael Brown, immediate past director of York's Centre for Jewish Studies who received this year's Founding Friend of the Campus Award, Kaye said that no one person has fought harder for the needs of the students than Brown has.

York student Seth Winberg said Brown recognized the "value of Jewish students doing Jewish on campus" and credited Brown with influencing his decision to attend York.

Professor Martin Lockshin, Brown's successor as director of the Centre for Jewish Studies, praised Brown's dedication and skill as a teacher and credited him for developing Jewish Studies at York at a time when the field existed only at a handful of public universities and was more likely to be taught by Christian clergymen than Jewish scholars.

Brown was the "guiding spirit" behind York's Jewish teacher education program, which Lockshin called the "jewel in the crown" of the Jewish Studies program. "It fills a real need in the Jewish community, and makes us very cutting edge."

It is also a place where Jews of all denominations and no denomination work together "in what I wish could be a model for the Jewish community," said Lockshin.

Brown, in turn, credited the university administration and his York colleagues for their support of the Jewish studies program.

Still on the agenda, he said, is the creation of an appropriate physical facility for York's 4,000 Jewish students.

Nikki Greenspan, Aaron Kasman and Brian Wolk, presidents of the Jewish student organizations at York, U of T and Ryerson respectively, received Presidents' awards.

Campus awards were presented to:

- Lonny Kates and Victor Volfson, Jewish Students' Association at Ryerson;
- Josh Goodman, Robin Hermolin and Sivan Raz, Jewish Students' Federation at York University;
- Ari Brodski, Jenny Herbert and Becca Siggner, Jewish Students' Union at the University of Toronto.

The following citywide awards were also presented:

- Robin Epstein, The Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto Action Committee for Jewish Continuity Award for Enhancing Jewish Identity and Continuity;
- Roni Hoffman, The Jacobovici Family Award for Arts and Culture;
- Daniel Saul, The Canadian Jewish News Award for Communication;
- Adam Cutler, The Gropper Family Award for Outstanding Leadership;
- Leanne Gruszecki, The Paisley Manor Insurance Brokers Inc. Award for Special Involvement in Jewish Campus Life;
- Harvey Cayne, The Nechama and Ya'akov Kaner Award for Creative Programming;
- Benji Matta and Daniel Held, The Lapowich Family Award for Israel Advocacy on Campus; and
- Joel Goldberg, The Jewish Campus Services Award for Ongoing Commitment to Jewish Student Life.

Students get set to 'Rock for Israel'

TORONTO — This year, in addition to the walk for Israel held here on Monday, students will be able to "Rock for Israel" at the Hard Rock Cafe at Skydome.

The student fund-raiser, which will take place May 30 at 9:30 p.m., is a joint initiative of Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto, CJC Regional Communities of Ontario and UIA Federations Canada. All proceeds from door admission, a raffle and an on-site tzedakah box will be directed to the Israel Emergency Campaign launched earlier this month.

"We knew there was a desire within the student community to do something to help with the situation [in Israel]," said Jordan Cares, program director, London Jewish Campus Services (LJCS). "Hopefully this will be a blockbuster...and we'll be able to make a difference."

The event was undertaken at the initiative of Jared Isaacson, LJCS director, in co-operation with colleagues in Toronto and a committee of students from several universities.

"A lot of students from the campuses across Ontario end up back in Toronto for the summer," said Isaacson, adding that opportunities for multi-campus projects don't come up that often. "The connection to the Jewish community and to Israel is not just felt eight months a year."

Josh Shuval, immediate past president of the Jewish Students's Union at the University of Western Ontario and a committee member for the upcoming fund-raiser, said organizers are hoping to raise $5,000 to $6,000.

Raffle tickets are $2, or $3 for five. Admission is $10, and students must be 19 or older to be admitted. — F.K.

Lazarecks to be feted at Winnipeg Negev Dinner

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Karyn and Mel Lazareck, this year's Jewish National Fund Negev gala honorees, generally shy away from the spotlight.

"We feel very flattered but undeserving. There are a lot of people in this community who have worked longer and harder than us," says Mel.

They agreed to be honorees this year, he said, because of the desperate situation in Israel, and because funds raised from the gala, to be held June 18, will go toward a project dear to their hearts, a new integrated JNF summer camping program for children with special needs in Israel.

Lazareck, who recently retired from the scrap metal business, is chairing this year's Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/Combined Jewish Appeal campaign, a role he has assumed three times in the past.

Karyn has also co-chaired the campaign with longtime friend Barbara Kives.

The Lazarecks have been Max Shore Young Leadership Award winners and are active in other Jewish community organizations, including a program that integrates children with special needs into the Jewish community.

They have three sons, Sam, Adam, and Jordan, 21, who has been diagnosed with pervasive development disorder.

"When Jordan was younger, I was busy running around looking at different therapies," says Karyn.

"While I was confident that I was on the right track, a friend pointed out to me that there were other families out there with similar problems who could use some help and support."

Her response was to call a meeting, and this led to the Winnipeg Jewish community's first conference on special needs individuals, which she chaired.

"We really tapped a nerve," she says.

Karyn and Mel Lazareck

"People came out of the woodwork. We were expecting maybe 40 people and ended up with 200. We were astounded at the range of issues that were raised and the degree of alienation many felt about the Jewish community."

The Lazarecks are now part of a special needs Jewish parent support group that meets regularly and cuts across denominational lines

As well, special needs children are welcomed and accommodated in the synagogues, schools and Jewish summer camps.

"A lot of people in the community call Karyn for advice and information," Mel says.

In the fall, Jordan is attending a program in New Haven, Conn., where he will learn life skills in a college setting.

"Adam and Sam are going to university. It is natural that Jordan should be, too. Education is very important in our family."

Mel has just returned from a solidarity mission to Israel, where he visited the site of the integrated camp, the first of its kind in Israel.

"It's a beautiful setting. It's located on top of a hill overlooking a magnificent forest. The kids will love it."

Tom Gilman, JNF president for Manitoba and Saskatchewan, says they hope to sell out the 1,200 seat concert hall for the Negev gala.

The review of school textbooks produced by the Palestinian Authority reveals that these children are exposed systematically to the ideas of terror and to becoming martyrs. Their school maps show Palestine from the river to the sea, with no Israel in sight, a sure way to produce a nation of terrorists. The Europeans will learn this at their own pace.

מי חוסם את השלום?

חשבונו קבלתי את הנוסח הבא ב- אי מייל, והוא מצלצל מאוד משכנע. זה הולך ככה:

איך אפשר לעצור את האלימות במזרח התיכון? האם יש פתרון למשבר הישראלי- פלשתינאי?

כמובן שיש, הוא נקרא "שתי מדינות לשני עמים"- מדינה פלשתינאית בגדה ובעזה לצד מדינת ישראל.

ארה"ב אמרה "כן", אידופה אמרה "כן", ישראל אמרה "כן", וכך גם האו"ם ומדינות ערב.

מדוע זה לא קרה? כי ערפאת אמר "לא".

בשנת אלפיים הוצעה מדינה פלשתינאית שתכלול 97% משטח הגדה והרצועה ועוד שלושה אחוז משטחים בישראל, פלוס שליטה בירושלים המזרחית. ערפאת אמר "לא" והתחיל את האינתיפאדה ושנתיים של טרור. מדוע? האם זה בגלל ויכוח על שלושה אחוזי שטח?

אפילו היום 73% ישראלים תומכים במדינה פלשתינאית לצד ישראל בתנאי שהטרור יופסק.

לעומת זה, 69% פלשתינאים תומכים בפיגועי התאבדות.

הסיבה האמיתית לאי השגת שלום היא רצונם של המנהיגים הפלשתינאים במדינה במקום ישראל ולא לצד ישראל.

הנה חלק זעיר מן העובדות:

" ועידת אוסלו היתה סוס טרויאני: המטרה האסטרטגית היא שחרור פלשתין מהירדן לים" (פיסל חוסייני, שר בממשלת ערפאת בראיון ב- 24 ביוני 2001).

עשרות סמלים, מפות ועיטורים פלשתינאים מראים את "פלשתין חשלמה" ללא זכר למדינת ישראל.

ואולי תחשוב וחחושף יותר מכך: מה מלמדים הפלשתינים בבתי הספר? הינה מעט ממה שכתוב בספרי לימוד רשמיים של הרשות:

"דע בני, שאדמה טהורה ספוגה בדם של שאהידים."

"אברהם היה מוסלמי, ולא השתייך ליהודים המושמדים".

"זכור, התוצאה הסופית תהיה ניצחון המוסלמים על היהודים".

ושוב, במפות ספרי הלימוד פלשתין תמיד מצויירת על כל שטח ישראל.

וחסיכום:

הטרור אינו ספונטאני. הוא תוצאה של תכנון מדוקדק, חינוך ילדים שמתחיל בבית הספר, לפני שהם מסוגלים להעביר בקורת ולהגיע לדיעות עצמאיות. זו הדרך הבטוחה להפוך מדינה שלמה, עם שָׁלֵם לטרוריסטים.

יד על הלב

עם יד על הלב, הנוסח שמופיע למעלה- יש בו כמה פינות לא מדוייקות:

ישראל לא הסכימה רשמית למדינה פלשתינאית. היה זה אחוד ברק שהעלה את ההצעה בקמפ דיוויד בנסיון אחרון למנוע את הנפילה לתהום. בעשותו זאת הימר ברק שאם הנושא יגיע למשאל עם- הוא יזכה ברוב. ערפאת כמובן לא הסכים ממילא וכך הפך התרגיל להתאבדות פוליטית של ברק. אבל יד על הלב: כשהיה ברק בקמפ דיוויד זעקו אנשי הימין, ובראשם שרון, שאין לברק מנדט ללגיע לסיכום על מדינה פלשתינאית. שרון ללא ספק התבטא אינספור פעמים נגד מדינה כזו, ועד כה לא אמר דברים ברורים בעניין. שרון מאמין, ואני מאמין שיהא צודק- שאנשי ערפאת, אם ניתן היה בידם, היו רוצים לחסל את ישראל, ועל כן הוא סבור שאין לאפשר להם להקים מדינה. אני, וכמותי רבים אחרים מאמינים שיש להקים מדינה פלשתינאית, כי מדינה כזו תהיה ערובה בטוחה יותר לישראל, מאחר ויהיה לפלשתינאים מה להפסיד אם ימשיכו באלימות ובטרור.

אישית אני מאמין שהסכיזה חד צדדית שלנו על הסכמתינו למדינה כזו בתנאי שתילחם ותתנגד לטרור,-תביא לשינוי חיובי. אבל לשם כך צריך מנהיגים שמאמינים בזה. אבל שישאר בינתיים.

Judging the Jewish State

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

One of the perennial questions faced by supporters of Israel, which has become even more pertinent after Operation Defensive Shield, is why the Jewish State is judged by a much higher standard than is applied to any other country. Almost any other sovereign state would have been less restrained if confronted by the violence and terrorism Israel has experienced, especially after sincere efforts to negotiate a settlement with an adversary.

Over the past couple of weeks, a number of Canadian journalists have addressed this question and done so superbly. Rosie DiManno's May 8 column, "Holding Israel to an unattainable standard," in the Toronto Star and John Downing's column, "Hatred fans the flames of terrorism," Toronto Sun, May 8, are just two prominent examples. Those in the Jewish community who feel beleaguered by the international community's isolation and condemnation of Israel (especially European reaction to the Arab propaganda about a "massacre" at Jenin) should take comfort from the decency shown by journalists such as DiManno and Downing, among many others, who have stood up against the chorus of one-sided, hypocritical excoriation of Israel.

The Jews, as a quintessentially self-critical people with a well-deserved reputation for being at the forefront of the struggle for human rights, should not have any difficulty with well-founded, proportionate criticism of Israel. However, when that criticism is vastly unfair, even obsessive, one must challenge the source.

For those critics who are not motivated by any anti-Jewish bias, including most of the North American media, there is still the question of fairness and proportionality. Why does the slaughter of 34 Russians, including 12 schoolchildren, in a terrorist attack on May 9, merit merely a passing reference in much of the media, while major attention is focused on only the potential for Israeli retribution in Gaza for a suicide bombing in Rishon Lezion that killed 16 people?

Why, for that matter, do Israel's actions in Operation Defensive Shield get compared with Russia's operations in Chechnya? "Nothing the Israelis have done lately in the West Bank is any worse than what our noble allies the Russians have been doing for years in separatist Chechnya, where the scorched-earth policy continues unchecked and barely reported, despite confessed atrocities by the Russians themselves," wrote John MacArthur, the publisher of Harper's magazine, in the Globe and Mail (May 13).

Oddly, MacArthur may have thought he was being fair to Israel in his comparison. In fact, nothing Israel has done comes remotely near the wanton barbarity of Russia's aggression against the Chechens.

The truly interesting point to be drawn from MacArthur's article is the gross disparity between the hyper-reaction to anything Israel does, compared to the "barely reported" events involving other groups such as the Kurds or the Algerians, 100,000 of whom were slaughtered in the last decade by extremist Islamist factions in the face of appalling apathy.

As the New Republic once mordantly observed about the world's studied indifference to the Kurds, their fate is not to have had the Jews as their enemy.

Hamilton Negev Dinner to honour Harts

By JULIA KOLLEK
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — This year, the Jewish National Fund (JNF) celebrates 100 years of land development, forest planting, water conservation and educational programming.

To mark the anniversary, the Negev Dinner in Hamilton is honouring Drs. Sharon and Lawrence Hart at a fund-raising dinner on June 9. Middle East expert and negotiator U.S. Ambassador Dennis Ross will be the guest speaker.

The Harts have devoted their time to a number of Jewish community organizations – local, national and international – since they moved to Hamilton in 1987.

Sharon, who grew up in Montreal, is currently national vice-president of the Jewish National Fund (JNF) of Canada and also serves as national chair of JNF's centennial committee. She recently represented Canada at JNF's world conference in Jerusalem. In recognition of her commitment, she was awarded the prestigious Bernard Bloomfield Medal for Meritorious Service in 1998.

Lawrence, who was born and raised in South Africa, is an associate professor of medicine at McMaster University and director of the rheumatic disease unit at Chedoke Division, Hamilton Health Sciences.

Drs. Sharon and Lawrence Hart

Currently the chair of the public affairs committee of the Hamilton Jewish Federation, Lawrence was recently elected national president of Maccabi Canada. He recently stepped down from a three-year term as national president of B'nai Brith Canada, and has also served on the executives of the Canada-Israel Committee and Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region. He is currently on the board of directors of Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), where the couple has chosen to educate their three daughters: Lara, Ilana and Yael.

A diplomat and a scholar, Ross spent more than 12 years shaping U.S. policy in the Middle East. He served as special Middle East coordinator under former U.S. president Bill Clinton, who awarded him the Presidential Medal for Distinguished Federal Civilian Service. Ross was also an ambassador for former U.S. President George Bush and he has worked closely with secretaries of state James Baker, Warren Christopher and Madeleine Albright.

Ross used his skills to broker the Oslo II agreement between Israel and the Palestinians in 1995. He also helped facilitate the 1997 Hebron accord, the Israeli-Jordan peace treaty in 1994 and has worked to try to bring Israel and Syria together.

Tickets for the dinner are still available at $360 per couple. Call the Hamilton JNF office at 905-527-5516.

Edmonton rally for Israel draws 300

By TAMARA STECYK
Special to The CJN

EDMONTON — A newly formed Alberta organization demonstrated its support for Israel at a Mother's Day rally at the provincial legislature here.

About 300 people, including about 100 Christians, held signs saying "Edmonton Stands with Israel" and "Israel, You'll Never Walk Alone," said Amnon Noy, chair of the Alberta Association for Solidarity for Israel.

The association is a group of concerned Albertans from a number of ethnic backgrounds that aims to promote a better understanding of Israel during the current crisis.

In a speech to the May 13 rally, Meir Romem, consul-general of Israel for Toronto and Western Canada, said Israel needs the support of the Diaspora, Noy said.

Noy also addressed the crowd, saying the rally is a demonstration of Albertans' commitment to peace, security and hope for the future.

"We are not fighting the Palestinian people and we continue to respect their aspirations to independence," said Noy, who arrived in Canada from Israel two years ago. "If the Palestinian leadership is ready to choose peace and progress, they will find that no people want peace or are prepared to sacrifice more for it than the people of Israel."

He emphasized that people can show their solidarity by visiting the Jewish state.

About 300 people came out to show their support for Israel at a rally in Edmonton.

"Now is the time to visit Israel. Now is the time to restore the security and the economy of Israel through the unity of our people," Noy said.

During the hour-long rally, three Edmonton girls read poetry, and a representative from the Jewish community also spoke.

Noy said his month-old group hopes to make connections with the Jewish community in Calgary and said there are plans for more events to help educate Albertans about Israel, but no dates have been set.

"We thought we had to do something to support Israel at this time. We always said we don't want any wars," said Noy.

Report: Israel sinks Gaza-bound arms ship, crew

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The arms-laden ship apparently bound for the Gaza Strip, which was recently sunk by the Israeli Navy, was carrying a crew of 20 armed men and a cache that included Katyusha rockets and anti-tank missiles, according to a report in the weekly British-based defence magazine, Foreign Report.

According to the report, details of which were published last Thursday in the daily newspaper Yediot Achronot, Israel's original plan was to seize the boat and publicly display its contents. But after Israel Defence Forces (IDF) intelligence reported that the boat was heavily guarded by 20 armed men who were primed for a possible attempt to intercept the ship, the decision was taken to sink the boat rather than capture it. This was reportedly done with the use of a missile.

According to the report, IDF intelligence did not succeed in uncovering who was behind the arms ship, but was certain it was headed for the Palestinian Authority (PA).

The plan was for the boat to reach the Gaza coast where the crew would throw the weapons overboard in waterproof containers, and where Palestinians disguised as fisherman were to pick them up.

The sinking of the ship was first reported in Sunday's edition of the New York Post. Uri Dan, a longtime close associate of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, reported in the Post that the IDF had sunk a weapons ship off the coast of Gaza. The IDF refused to comment.

Palestinian efforts at weapons smuggling via the sea were stymied after the Karine-A weapons ship affair, but military sources say there has been a recent upsurge of Palestinian efforts at such smuggling, especially after the capture of large stockpiles of arms during Operation Defensive Shield last month.

Last May, the IDF captured a small weapons-smuggling boat, called the Santorini, which was financed by Iran. Prior to that, the PA apparently managed to bring in a number of smaller vessels carrying weapons.

According to Israeli security sources, Hezbollah and Ahmed Jibril's Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine General Command, are the main players in the effort to smuggle arms into the PA via the Mediterranean. At the same time, various Palestinian security services and other terror groups try smuggling via land, with the main route along the Egyptian border with Rafah, though there are also efforts, often with the help of Israeli underworld groups, to smuggle arms through Jordan and across the Egyptian border in the southern Negev.

Canadian Friends of Laniado Hospital

FUNDRAISER

Since its creation in 1975 Laniado Hospital in Netanya has been recognized as one of the leading medical institutions in Israel today, offering a wide range of high-quality medical care to all those in need. Recently, Netanya has seen more than its fair share of terror attacks, and Laniado has become a key facility in the Israel Government's Emergency Medicine Strategy. At the same time, Canadian Friends of Laniado Hospital is focusing its fundraising efforts towards the ongoing campaign to complete the construction of the new Children's Hospital being built in memory of the 1.5 million innocent children who were killed during the Holocaust. A major fundraising tribute dinner is being planned for 2003. For this we are recruiting a full time fundraiser to work with Canadian Friends of Laniado Hospital, Ontario Region.

You will help build short, medium and long-term fundraising strategies. Specific key areas for you will include individual / committee development and achievement of financial targets.

Working alone or in a small team, you will manage the design and delivery of strategic thinking through to implementation. You will need to develop effective relationships with senior lay leaders and will play a part in converting their ideas into results. Your career will be filled with achievements in sales and fundraising in which you personally have played a key role. Whilst experience in an allied charity or business is essential, you must have individual credibility along with strong interpersonal skills to complete the picture.

Our highly competitive salary is indicative of the results that will be expected of you. Creativity, innovation and the ability to work under pressure are essential and good computer skills would be advantageous.

For an application kit, please send your CV by email to: Mr. Chaim Fachler, International Director of Public Relations and Fundraising at Laniado Hospital (cfachler@laniado.org.il).

Closing date for applications: Tuesday, June 4th, 2002. Interviews will be conducted in Toronto during the last week in June.

Toronto native gives key advice to Sharon

One of only two assistant foreign policy advisors to the prime minister (a third foreign policy advisor ranks above him and his colleague), he has often been asked to accompany American visitors in Israel.

In a telephone interview from Jerusalem, Lipner recalled how he and Zinni visited Ben Yehuda Street in Jerusalem the day after a terrorist suicide bomber wreaked havoc on young people out for some Saturday night fun.

With the site still showing the signs of devastation, Lipner said, "I picked up some of the bolts the guy was packing and showed it to [Zinni]. I think he was extremely overcome that these guys went ahead [with an attack] on a Saturday night on kids out for a good time."

Developing relationships and personalizing foreign policy issues has its advantages, Lipner said. George W. Bush's famed helicopter ride a few years ago over Israel, the West Bank and to the Golan Heights, hosted by then-Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon when Bush was governor of Texas, is a prime example of the effect personal ties can have on diplomacy, Lipner said.

"The ability to hands-on experience things with people and show what it's like to live here and to show people we are the only genuine democracy in the Middle East" does have "an incredible effect" on visitors, he said.

Still, beyond cultivating personal relationships, Lipner's job has a geopolitical aspect in its focus on power, policy and diplomacy.

During the recent Israeli military operation in the West Bank, Lipner was heavily involved in talks with British and American interlocutors over the disposition of the terrorists living under Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's protection in his Ramallah compound. Eventually the terrorists were moved to a detention centre in Jericho under the control of British and American jailers.

He was also part of the Israeli team working to find a solution to the standoff at Bethlehem's Church of the Nativity, in which 13 terrorists were removed to Cyprus and 26 others were transported to the Gaza Strip. During the standoff, he held talks with leaders of three major churches with a stake in the Christian holy site.

Lipner believes the Christian clergy were generally sympathetic to the Israeli position. "They recognized Israel had kept its commitment not to enter or violate the sanctity of the church and that the Palestinian terrorists in the church were those who violated the status quo," he stated.

Not all of his assignments are so eventful. Although 12- to 14-hour workdays are not uncommon, a recent typical day included a meeting with the Australia-Israel Chamber of Commerce, discussions with the prime minister's chief of staff and talks with the director of policy planning from the French foreign ministry.

With his Canadian background, Lipner believes he has "an intuitive perspective" on the North American political scene. "My role involves ongoing contacts and co-ordination with [the U.S.] administration, Congress, opinion leaders, media, think tanks, Jewish groups, whose activities and perspectives all impact on our policy formulation process," he said.

Regarding his former homeland, he said the Israeli prime minister's office "certainly views Canada as a friend, and we hope the full gamut of relations will continue to flourish and become stronger. We would like if Canada in international fora was more unequivocally behind Israel."

Lipner has served in the Foreign Ministry under six prime ministers representing both the Labour and Likud parties: Yitzchak Shamir, Yitzhak Rabin, Shimon Peres, Benjamin Netanyahu, Ehud Barak and Sharon.

> 'An intuitive perspective on North America'

Each brings unique talents to the position and different nuances to the way they address issues, Lipner said. Employing a diplomatic side-step, Lipner declined to compare his bosses' ways of doing business and the extent to which they relied on the advice of experts.

"Most prime ministers are secure enough and understand the need to hear the views of other people," he offered. "I think in general they respond well to that. Ultimately, they make the decisions."

As regards the current prime minister's reputation as a bulldozer determined to get his own way, Lipner disagreed, saying he is "certainly amenable" to the advice of others. "I think there is a certain flexibility from all those years of being in politics... I think we've seen it."

Sharon, he pointed out, agreed to repeated unilateral ceasefires that were violated by the Palestinians, he agreed to the Tenet and Mitchell plans and he responded positively to the Saudi peace proposals, which, Lipner noted, were never presented directly to Israel.

"I think people have a tendency not to pay attention to what happens on the ground," he said.

More than 50 per cent of Israeli casualties from terrorist attacks are attributable to members of Arafat's own organizations. "That tiger has not changed its stripes," he said.

Lipner rejected suggestions by political pundits that Sharon has closed the door to a political settlement with the Palestinians by not offering a state as part of an end game strategy.

"The prime minister has said time and again he's ready to make painful compromises," Lipner said, adding that Israel needs "someone to sit with on the other side."

Although he now sits close to Israel's seat of power, when he first travelled to Israel 15 years ago, Lipner was merely trying to expand his education. With a degree in international affairs from the University of Toronto under his belt (he served as an intern with the Canada-Israel Committee prior to moving to Israel), Lipner studied the same subject at Hebrew University. He later earned an MBA from Boston University.

While in school in Israel, he learned of an opening as an editor/translator at a government press office. He took the job and never looked back.

Lipner worked his way through the foreign policy bureaucracy, serving as director of communications in the government press office (another name for the prime minister's office), as advisor to Rabbi Michael Melchior on issues pertaining to the world Jewish community and in his current role as assistant foreign policy advisor to Sharon.

Lipner doesn't get back to Toronto much these days, only once every couple of years, or when he's en route to or from Washington, D.C., where he sometimes travels to meet U.S. Congressmen, Jewish leaders and U.S. State Department officials.

But he loves what he's doing in Israel. "I think what brought me here is that I wanted to take part in the history of the Jewish people. What an incredible privilege to be able to help write it. I felt this is where the future is, and to help it unfold has been a great privilege."

Netanya bombers captured or dead

BY AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Israel Defence Forces and the Shin Bet security service have arrested or killed almost all the members of the Hamas terrorist cell from Tulkarm that was responsible for the suicide bombing during a seder at the Park Hotel in Netanya on March 28.

The Passover attack left 29 people dead and some 150 injured. Investigations revealed the same cell was behind a suicide bombing in Netanya's market in March 2001 that killed 3 people and injured 55. The cell is also believed to be responsible for a third attack in Netanya this past March that killed five people and injured 74.

The cell's leader, Abbas Sa'id, was arrested along with several other members of the group during a four-day incursion into Tulkarm in early May. Sa'id went into hiding after the assassinations of a senior member of the cell, Fuaz Badran, in July2001, and of Amar Hadari, a bomb-maker, a month later.

After the assassination of Badran and Hadari, the Shin Bet arrested several individuals connected with the cell in Tulkarm and obtained intelligence that two bombers from the cell, Abed Ouda and Nidal Kalk, were planning additional attacks. Their names were given to the Palestinian Authority (PA), which did nothing to stop them. Ouda carried out the Park Hotel attack and Kalk was arrested in Operation Defensive Shield.

In January, the Shin Bet received information that Hamas operatives in Nablus had transferred a bomb to the Tulkarm cell. In March, Shin Bet put together a partial picture of the planned attack, but details were lacking.

On the day of the Park Hotel bombing, Shin Bet received information on the planned time of the bombing, but not the location, and police failed to apprehend the bomber.

ADMINISTRATIVE ASSISTANT

A busy and fast paced non-profit organization seeks an experienced person with a high level of secretarial and computer experience. A study in contrasts among Palestinian leaders

By ED MORGAN

Comment

After a Passover season when the United Nation's (UN) Mary Robinson and the NDP's Svend Robinson left Israelis feeling like Robinson Crusoe, lost and alone in a sea of hostility, one might think that intellectual debate would come to a standstill. In fact, nothing could be further from the truth.

A group of Canadian lawyers recently had an intense look at the system of justice and human rights advocacy in Israel. The group, in addition to myself, included former premier Bob Rae, criminal lawyer John Rosen, civil litigators Neil Finkelstein, Marvin Kurz and Stanley Fisher, refugee lawyer and academic Sharryn Aiken and Ontario government lawyers Vanessa Yolles and Felicia Zeidman.

We covered the legal terrain from the Israeli Supreme Court and the state prosecutor's office to defence counsel and human rights organizations. We went to academic meetings in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and Haifa, as well as political meetings with several cabinet members and the opposition Meretz party. On the international law front, we visited with Israel's one member of the UN Human Rights Commission, and with the Israel Defence Forces' (IDF) senior legal officer specializing in the laws of war.

Sari Nusseibeh

Of all the insights to be gained by meeting people involved firsthand with Israeli law and democracy, perhaps the most unique moments were those spent with Palestinian notables. We met with Sari Nusseibeh in his office at the main campus of Al-Quds University in east Jerusalem, and with Hannan Ashrawi at her home in Ramallah within a block of the compound housing Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat's headquarters. The contrast between the two meetings was striking.

Our visit to Ramallah came at a time of tension in the town. Although the fighting had already ended in Jenin and other points of heavy engagement, the Church of the Nativity siege was still ongoing in Bethlehem, as was the siege of Arafat's compound in Ramallah. The killers of tourism minister Rahavam Ze'evi, having been convicted by a mockery of justice in Arafat's own office, were still inside the PA headquarters.

Hannan Ashrawi

Thanks to some helpful logistical support from the Canadian government, we were chauffeured to Ramallah in a steel-plated, landmine-proof vehicle with diplomatic plates. The two-inch thick windows and RCMP-trained driver made us feel more secure, while the small maple leaf flapping from the antenna got us quickly through the several security checks. Although the Canadian Embassy staff was braced for delay, the only confrontation we encountered in crossing the Green Line was over our car going the wrong way down a one-way lane at the main Kalandia checkpoint. In Canada, the Mounties may always get their man, but this time our Mountie driver was gotten by the mishmar hagvul (Israeli border police).

Ramallah itself was not quite the picturesque place it had been when I was last there in 1979, but it was also not quite the ruined war zone one might expect from a daily overdose of CNN. We made our way on roads that were substantially the worse for the wear of recent battles, trying to find the best way into the IDF-controlled area surrounding the compound. In the rest of the city, uniformed Palestinian officers were directing the chaotic traffic, signaling that the infrastructure necessary for daily law and order seems to have survived the latest fighting. The Canadian Criminal Code refers to our police as "peace officers;" it's a phrase one hopes the Palestinian police will take to heart.

In one bizarre moment at a dusty intersection, we saw a small television crew setting up its equipment around a very bored-looking man bearing a striking resemblance to Geraldo Rivera. Upon closer inspection, it turned out to be Geraldo himself, apparently hoping for more action than was available that day. A group of visiting Canadians didn't do the trick for him, so we made our way to Ashrawi's spacious villa. There the television-style show began in earnest.

Ashrawi is a well-dressed, well-spoken person whose presentation is almost ideal for beaming into millions of viewers' homes. Her political analysis was, for want of a better phrase, the PA's party line. Using an American idiom that seemed made for TV, she at one point explained that she meant nothing personal by the phrase, but, "it's the occupation, stupid."

Ten minutes later, however, she had forgotten about the West Bank and its occupation, and was on to the Palestinian right of return to Jaffa and Haifa. Israel and the territories seemed inseparable in her mind. When asked whether this wasn't contrary to any possibility of a two-state solution, her response was that it was not for her to defend Zionism. We were left with the impression of an uncompromising adversary in elegant clothing.

The next afternoon, we had a very different experience at Nusseibeh's office at Al-Quds University. In the first place, in contrast to the rubble-strewn roads of Ramallah, the university is on a tree-lined street off the main roads in east Jerusalem. Although the situation in the region is still described by Palestinians as an intifadah, there was no visible evidence of an ongoing popular uprising. There is, of course, the constant threat of terrorism, but stone-throwing and street demonstrations seem to be a thing of the past, and travel through east Jerusalem is pleasant, even in a vehicle with Israeli plates.

Upon entering the university president's office suite, it was immediately apparent that the dishevelled and tweed-clad Nusseibeh was a study in contrast to the fashionable Ashrawi. The session itself was a freewheeling roundtable among the deans and chairs of several of the university's faculties. To our delight and surprise, our hosts engaged us in an open discussion of the current social, political, security, economic and cultural situation in which Palestinians and Israelis find themselves.

It was novel for us to hear Nusseibeh and his colleagues exhibit an understanding of Israeli politics and public opinion, and it was startling to hear them speak with knowledge and sensitivity about Jewish history, the Holocaust and the Zionist movement. We also heard their version of a Palestinian nationalism that does not need to spill over the Green Line, and learned of their continuous debates with Israelis and among themselves about their political future. In short, it was a scholarly session mercifully free of the polemics we found in Ramallah.

Of course, none of the Palestinian academics we met is likely to join the Likud, but they were equally unimpressed with the current political leadership of the PA. The commitment to coexistence was palpable, while the Al-Quds University law dean was emphatic that his greatest challenge is to inculcate in his students a commitment to the proper rule of law within Palestinian society itself. In the words of the sages Lennon and McCartney: lu yehi (let it be).

Corn for Cranes: Some 13,000 cranes that winter in Israel's Hula Valley used to feast on the area's peanut crops until Israel's Nature and Parks Protection Authority came up with a better idea. The authority arranged for farmers to set aside an area in which to feed the cranes with three tons of corn kernels a day. Not only was peanut crop damage dramatically decreased, but the feeding cranes have become a significant tourist attraction. The cranes fly to Europe in late February and return to Israel in October.

Jordan Merkur plans to get theatre out of the red

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — As the new artistic director of the Red Barn Theatre in Jackson's Point, Jordan Merkur is dedicating the first play he directs there to the memory of his father, the late David Merkur, a theatre buff.

The play, Over the River and Through the Woods, is about meddling grandparents. A comedy involving an Italian young man who thinks he is to be married, it runs June 18 to July 6.

The Red Barn season opens first with veteran comedian David Broadfoot giving three performances, June 6, 7 and 8.

"I'm very excited about my new job," said Merkur, 40, the artistic director of Eclectic Theatre, who is better known as a director of drama and has won several Dora awards and nominations. But he is no stranger to comedy – the entire Red Barn season will be of that genre – because he also directed Chutzpah a Go Go.

His job as artistic director will be to get the Red Barn, the oldest professional summer theatre in Canada, out of the red ink. He plans to do this by shortening the season by two weeks, avoiding the 25-member casts that were required for some past musical productions, including Annie, Oklahoma and My Fair Lady, and putting on comedies and musicals that need smaller casts.

Indeed, Merkur has already cast all the plays for the season, with a total of 17 actors.

"I'm bringing well-known Canadian actors and playwrights to Jackson's Point for the first time," he said.

Other plays to be performed include I Love You, You're Perfect, Now Change, a series of sketches and songs about gender relationships (July 18 to Aug. 3); and Foursome, a comedy about golf by Norman Foster (Aug. 7 to 24).

"I am particularly interested in Sophie Tucker, The Last of the Red Hot Mamas, played by Valerie Boyle, because Sophie was a great fund-raiser for Jewish causes," Merkur said. "It will appeal to the people who remember Sophie Tucker. Valerie, who is not Jewish, has learned a lot of Yiddish lines for this play, and her rendition of My Yiddisha Moma is great. [Tucker's] accompanist in real life, for 47 years, was Teddy Shapiro, and Teddy will be played by Randy Vancourt, who was in Chutzpah a Go Go."

Jordan Merkur

It runs Aug. 28 to Sept. 14, ending the season.

Merkur's grandfather, Abraham, owned a cottage at Jackson's Point and was a supporter of the Red Barn, taking Jordan as a boy to the shows. His mother, Myra, still owns a cottage at Gamebridge Beach near Beaverton.

Red Barn features bargain Tuesdays, with all tickets selling at $19, the same price as for matinees and previews.

To help fill the seats, Merkur is counting on bus tours that come to the picnic area for the day and include a play at Red Barn. For those coming in their own cars, there is plenty of free parking. He thinks there will be more customers from outside than from the Lake Simcoe area itself.

Klezmer band to take fans on a wonderful journey

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band is moving forward with an evening-length program they believe "will take people on a wonderful journey," says bandleader David Buchbinder, 42.

The concert, Shekhine: Spirit in the Natural World, is at the Isabel Bader Theatre, 93 Charles St. W., May 25 at 8 p.m., with special guests, award-winning saxophonist and flutist Jane Bunnett and actor Alex Poch-Goldin.

The concert marks their first Toronto gig in over a year.

"It will be made up of different tunes and songs, but tied together by an overall concept," Buchbinder says. "The idea for the concert rose out of the poems of [Yiddish poet] Abraham Sutzkever. His poetry is beautiful and totally reflects the idea of spirituality and an almost religious experience found in nature and the natural world, which is something not always expressed in Judaism, although it is found in early Chassidism."

In addition to Buchbinder, who plays trumpet and flugelhorn, the band, which will soon celebrate 15 years together, includes Daniel Barnes on drums, Marilyn Lerner on piano, R.W. (Bob) Stevenson on clarinet and bass clarinet, Andrew Downing on acoustic and electric bass and vocalist Dave Wall.

Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band

The concert will present almost entirely new music, mostly written by the band members. Other influences come from poems by Walt Whitman, Leonard Cohen, The Song of Songs and more.

"Instead of a normal concert, where the band goes from one song to another, our songs will blend into poems and blend into instrumental tunes that will then blend into a combination of all of them," Buchbinder says.

BOOK FOCUSES ON TWO MONTREAL ORPHANAGES

Former Montrealer Judy Gordon has written a book about two little-known institutions, the Montreal Hebrew Orphans Home and the Montefiore Hebrew Orphans Home. The book, Four Hundred Brothers and Sisters: A Story of Two Jewish Orphanages in Montreal, 1909-1942, should be well over 225 pages when published in August, Gordon reports, and will sell for $19.95.

Dozens of former orphanage residents, including the author's husband Myer Gordon, still meet for annual reunions in Montreal; the next one is slated for Aug. 24. Judy Gordon sends out a quarterly newsletter to more than 100 people, but she is hoping to reach many others, including archives and libraries, who may wish to order advance copies of the book to help cover the publication cost. She also wishes to raise tzedakah for present-day orphans.

To inquire, phone 416-221-3161, e-mail mjnodrog@aol.com, or visit Gordon's table at the conference of the Association of Canadian Jewish Studies at Toronto's Beth Tzedec Synagogue on May 26.

Musician merges rock 'n' roll with Jewish prayers

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Daniel Greenwood believes the message is just as important as the medium.

His CD Onah Hashem is a collection of songs that combine lyrics from Jewish prayers with melodies teenagers might recognize from today's FM radio stations.

"The songs represents a combination of various type of music," Greenwood said in an interview, adding that "there is techno, hip-hop, blues, rock... bits and pieces of everything."

When composing the music, Greenwood, who taught himself guitar when he was 12 years old, felt it was important to provide today's youth with music with a positive moral message they could relate to.

"I wouldn't be happy if my kids were listening to an FM radio station because the lyrics they would hear would be alien to their frum lifestyle," Greenwood noted.

In addition, he said, most frum parents wouldn't want their kids looking up to rock stars for direction because, quite frankly, their moral direction is in drerd [in the ground]."

After several years playing at Shabbatons, Greenwood realized that many teenagers were searching for music that would be more in tune with their feelings, so he developed rhythms that would appeal to kids from 10 years old onwards.

"Onah Hashem is music for positive purposes and tries to make Torah and mitzvot fun and enjoyable," Greenwood said. A note on the jacket warns listeners "not to play on Shabbos and Yom Tov."

Daniel Greenwood tries to make Torah and mitzvot fun and enjoyable.

Songs include Tov Hashem Lakoil, Hashem Melech and Tov Lehoidos Lashem, and the melodies incorporate plenty of bass, drum and guitar.

Onah Hashem is available at Negev and Israel Bookstores. His songs can also be heard on his Web site at www.mp3.com/jewishmusic.

The poems will be read by Poch-Goldin.

"We wanted to bring another element into the music and Jane is a great choice because she has done something similar to what we've done. We've taken traditional Klezmer music and built our own sound while being true to the roots. She's done the same with Afro-Cuban music. Jane will be playing tunes we have written, and we will be playing some of her music that she feels fits with the band," Buchbinder adds.

"What we are doing is creating new music. When people think of Klezmer, they think of traditional Jewish dance music. We create our own compositions based in the traditions. We do play traditional tunes at weddings. We are happy to be included among some great Klezmer bands. Since the Klezmer revival about 20 years ago, the music has expanded past the point of being only traditional music. Its popularity hit a peak and has now settled into just existing, which I think is a healthy place to be. There are more and more people doing fascinating experiments with the music, as a vehicle for their own artistic expression."

Buchbinder, born in St. Louis, Mo., and raised since the age of nine in Toronto, says the band's fan base has always been across all lines – and not all Yiddish speakers. The band has performed where there are no Jews – both in North America and in Europe. The band has recorded 4 CDs, the latest titled Tsirkus.

Toronto fans know Buchbinder as founder and now artistic director emeritus of the Ashkenaz: A Festival of New Yiddish Culture, held every other year at Toronto's Harbourfront. Buchbinder has composed music for television, film and dance, and performs with a jazz collective and with Medina, an Arab-Yiddish fusion quartet.

"I think the most important thing we can do is to look for the connections between our two peoples and the places we can come together and stand for peace in action. For me, it is imagining in the present what a peaceful future would be like," Buchbinder says of the Arab-Yiddish musical partnership.

Treat Alzheimer's patients with respect, experts say

By PABLO FUCHS
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Patients dealing with Alzheimer's disease or any other type of dementia should be treated with respect and be allowed to make life-altering decisions in the early stages of their illness, experts recently told a Jewish medical ethics conference.

Dr. Nathan Herrmann, head of geriatrics at Sunnybrook Hospital and Women's College Health Sciences Centre, said that to remain ethical there are certain steps medical professionals should take to properly inform and educate patients of their condition.

The first thing a medical professional should do when assessing a client who has Alzheimer's disease or any other type of dementia is to ensure the diagnosis is 100 per cent accurate and not confuse other mental conditions with severe terminal illnesses like Alzheimer's, Herrmann said.

Once a proper diagnosis is made, it is imperative to inform patients of their condition and advise them on steps they can take to get their lives in order while they're still cognitive. At the same time, the medical professional must make a safety assessment to determine whether a patient is at risk of suicide, aggressive behaviour, depression, prone to falling or capable of driving a vehicle, Herrmann said.

"Patients must be made to feel that they're not alone in their struggles," he said. "As soon as they're diagnosed with Alzheimer's they receive contact information for the local chapter of the Alzheimer's society and information for support groups. They will also receive contacts for legal purposes, like assigning power of attorney to a loved one or re-writing their will while they're still cognitive."

Informing the patients that they have such a severe mental illness such as Alzheimer's can be a traumatic experience for doctors as well as patients, Herrmann said. "It's very difficult to tell someone they have a severe illness that will leave them with severely deteriorated mental capabilities."

Therefore, he said, doctors must be prepared for all possible reactions from patients and be prepared to calmly and coherently explain to patients what they have, what will happen to them and what they can do to deal with it.

Dr. Avraham Steinberg, a pediatric neurologist from Jerusalem, said it's all in how a person is told, as well whether a patient has the right amount of support and backup after the diagnosis.

He added that in the secular world, truth is imperative and doctors are obligated to tell patients everything they know about their medical condition. But he said truth is not necessarily an absolute value. "There are instances where it's best not to tell the patient everything," he said. "But of course, we are all obligated to judge whether it's best to withhold this truth."

Steinberg also said doctors must prohibit patients from driving if they deem a patient to be incapable of it. "Since it not only endangers the patients but others, then there is a greater obligation to stop this person from driving for the good of the society."

Patients must also be told of medicinal options and possibilities for future advancements and cures.

Herrmann said there are three drugs now available that slow down Alzheimer patients' cognitive decline, but there could be a vaccine against it in the near future and there could even be a cure in a decade's time.

"There's a lot of confidence in the medical community that there will be a cure in the future," he said. "We must project that to the patients and let them know that it's still worth living."

Shelter helps kids of abused mothers

MONTREAL — Auberge Shalom... Pour Femmes, which for more than a decade has provided Montreal's only kosher shelter for women who are victims of domestic violence, has launched a new treatment program for children who witness spousal abuse in their families.

This past winter, Auberge Shalom, a project of the National Council of Jewish Women, ran the program over 15 weeks, in conjunction with Batshaw Youth and Family Centres and CLSC Notre-Dame-de-Grâce/Montreal West.

Seven kids aged six to eight participated in the pilot project.

"The facilitators provided an environment in which the children felt respected, where their opinions were valued and where they felt they were safe to share their personal experiences in a group," said Diane Sasson, executive-director of Auberge Shalom.

The program was an opportunity for them to interact with other kids who have gone through the same thing and thereby break the isolation often felt by children in this situation, she said.

Time to get pumped for the Becel Ride for Heart

TORONTO — More than 13,000 cyclists and in-line skaters will be ready to roll at the 15th Becel Ride for Heart, June 2, 7:15 a.m.

From the new start line on the Gardiner Expressway at the west gates of Exhibition Place, cyclists will begin their ride along the world's biggest bike path, in support of the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Ontario.

When it began in 1987, the event attracted 160 cyclists. It has now become Canada's largest charitable cycling event, with 15,000 participants nationally.

Over the past 15 years, the foundation has raised over $10 million for heart and stroke research through the Ride for Heart.

Cyclists have a choice of a 25 km or 50 km route along the Gardiner and the Don Valley Parkway; and in-line skaters can complete a 2.5, 10 or 20 km route on the Gardiner, west of Exhibition Place.

Six Toronto-area bicycle retailers are providing registration sites up until the day of the event: Cyclepath, Curbside Bike and In-Line Skate Centre, Wheel Excitement, Gears Bike Shop, Bikes on Wheels, and Sporting Life. In addition, Canadian Tire is offering registration sites at participating stores in the GTA.

Register by mail at P.O. Box 3706, Stn. Industrial Park, Markham, Ont. L3R 6G9; fax 905-479-3604; phone (416-486-RIDE--7433); or online www.rideforheart.toronto.com.

Registrations and pledge drop-offs can be submitted at four Heart and Stroke Foundation check-in centres in the GTA on May 31 and June 1.

Call the Rideline at 416-486-RIDE or visit the Web site at www.rideforheart.toronto.com for the addresses of check-in centres.

Event-day registrations take place between 6:30 a.m. and 8:30 a.m. for cyclists, and between 6:30 a.m. and 7:45 a.m. for in-line skaters, at the Better Living Centre Building, Exhibition Place.

NEWS, NEWS, NEWS:

SpaMedica (66 Avenue Rd., Toronto) is the home of Canada's most advanced leg vein management program. It offers a full-service comprehensive leg vein diagnosis that includes all leg vein problems.

This is clearly unique and unlike most other vein treatments, which are often Band-Aid remedies. All leg vein consult patients are provided with a non-invasive, high-tech colour Doppler ultrasound analysis of their deep leg vein integrity. Leaky large veins and varicose veins can now be treated without stripping surgery. The cosmetic leg vein concerns are removed with an outpatient laser treatment that allows patients to return to activities immediately. So girls, isn't it fabulous! This could be your first summer without your hot and sticky hose!

The Beresford Clinic is probably one of the most complete anti-aging programs I have visited. Their group of practitioners, including a medical doctor, cosmetic surgeon, naturopath, psychotherapist and spiritual healer, is second to none. This unique collaboration provides results for feeling terrific and looking gorgeous – no matter what your age.

At the Training Zone in Toronto, there is a man named Augy Marmelo. He is, with out a doubt, the guru of fitness and has a series of workouts that require minimum effort with maximum benefits. His sure-fire techniques offer results similar to those in a magician's satchel. With the ease of a Cheshire cat, he has helped me take my body back about 10 years.

Spring 2002 runways were filled with bold colours. It seems that an '80s revival is here. However, translucent and iridescent colours will be upstaging the dense shades of years ago. Choose your favourite feature and play it up – have fun and be sure to polish your lips and nails with at least one shade of beige.

CAROL'S TIPS

SKIN CARE: Chanel introduces a set of beautiful products known as Les Activateurs. This unique cleansing line is included in the already sensational Precision Collection. Check out Activateur Eclat – a real radiance boast.

Soothe tired legs and feet with Lise Watier's Eau de Mer, a special cream that helps relieve tired legs.

Source Therapie from Biotherm is a little marvel that will revitalize and perfectly moisturize your skin in just seconds.

Refresh and moisten your face with Christian Dior's Hydra-Sorbet Aquatique from their new IOD Collection. This luscious cream smells like watermelon and is as light as a sorbet.

Fabulous from Lancaster is Aquamilk Body Lotion. It's smooth with a yogurt-like texture and absorbs instantly, providing intense hydration and effective nutrition.

Elizabeth Arden's new Ceramide Defining Eye Brightener is fantastic. It really helps reduce the appearance of dark circles and fine lines.

Nar's hydrating moisture cream infuses skin with moisture and is packed with anti-oxidants, vitamin C and retinol, as well as fennel extract to help re-texturize skin with an anti-wrinkle effect.

Is a cream ever worth hundreds of dollars? It seems Estee Lauder's Ultimate Lifting Crème is worth about $325. This amazing potion contains 54 precious ingredients from around the world that produce a cream more elegant than I have seen in awhile. It instantly locks in moisture and restores a luminous radiance – definitely worth it!

FOUNDATION: Photogenic Ultra Comfort from Lancome works like a magic wand, providing skin with comfort and soothing care in a single stroke – a satiny finish that is excellent for dry skin. Lancome's Flash Bronzer is an instant tint for your body. Its velvety texture smoothes on effortlessly and absorbs quickly to give skin an immediate golden glow.

MAC's Studio Tech is a marvelous cream-to-powder foundation. It is literally weightless and provides excellent coverage.

Elizabeth Arden's Flawless Finish Skin Balancing Makeup is a beautiful, lightweight, semi-matte liquid that provides medium coverage and adjusts to meet the needs of combination skin.

Help set your makeup with a Fix+ from MAC – a refreshing spritz to add moisture and sheen.

Lancome Flash Bronzer gives you an insant tint.

EYES: Dior's Mascara Aquadior is not only waterproof, but contains beeswax to soften and strengthen while in the sea and sun. For the most luscious lashes, try Diorshow, but don't wait as it is a limited edition. For great fun try Dior's Pastel Graffiti – your own artist collection of cream/gloss colours for eyes and lips.

Nar welcomes four new hot shades for some sizzling summer nights – check out glistening silver.

CHEEKS: Lancome reveals Blush Focus, a cream-to-powder, oil-free, long-lasting blush. It melts deliciously on the cheeks and forms a silky finish.

Elizabeth Arden's Bronzing Powder Duo is great to dust all over your face – an instant tan without the sun.

Nar's Multiple is a great product that can be worn on your eyes, lips or cheeks – don't miss the feminine shade Maui, created especially for spring.

LIPS/NAILS: Christian Dior's Glossy Sirop creates the perfect pout. Wear it alone or as a "top coat."

Check out Cargo's Val d'Or golden cranberry shade and top it with Cargo's luxurious gloss.

Pure Color Nail Lacquer from Estee Lauder resists chipping; and its oval-shaped brush colours the nail with one swift stroke.

Dior Addict Nail Color is also one coat, quick dry and total colour in just seconds.

Revlon's Lip Glide gives lips super colour and high shine in one playful twist-n-glide package.

Plump up your lips with Caryl Baker's (Visage) Naked Kiss lip gloss and lipstick. It has a vitamin B derivative that temporarily increases blood circulation causing the lip to swell slightly. When you first apply it, there is a tingling effect that lasts just minutes and the results last for couple of hours – such fun! It's complete with an excellent mirror and a pop-up tube for easy application on the go.

HAIR: Long hair is back, but with soft bouncy curls in delicate, refined pastel tones, says Terry Ritcey of Terry Ritcey Salon in Toronto (122A Yorkville Ave.). He also tells us that this summer brings the return of the ever-popular "bob" putting the focus onto the face by bringing the hair forward and making it sporty and very choppy. Short looks will also give full attention to the face, cropped short at the nape, fringed, shattered or wildly geometric.

Jeff Jager and Cristina Marra, the hair colour specialists at Ritcey's salon, suggest summer shades are all about intensity. Cool tones are icy cold, and warm tones are even warmer, like strawberry, apricot blondes. It's all about simplicity with colour. Start with a natural base, then add contrasting colours like gold, pastels and platinum. Very soft and wearable!

Redken's Swim Cream really helps protect your hair from sun and chlorine, and it keeps hair silky and free of chlorine damage.

L'Oreal introduces three new Tecni.Art products. A must have is Airfluid, a relaxing styling water that helps ward off the frizzies.

Kerastase introduces the spectacular collection Soleil, complete with seven products designed to protect hair from damaging effects of the sun, sea, salt and chlorine, as well as repair the damage –

FRAGRANCE: Boss in Motion from Hugo Boss is much like its name. The packaging is fabulous – it's shaped like a ball and encased in smooth metal.

Michal Kors introduces a series of grooming products, all in the designer's exquisite trademark scent, of course.

"So You," presented by Giorgio Beverly Hills is no doubt the new Giorgio Girl in all her glamour – rich with an oriental flare – delightfully decadent.

Tommy Hilfiger's Tommy and Tommy Girl cologne are quite a pair – refreshing with the pureness of a fresh breeze. Tommy's key lime/strawberry cream pie body hydrators are too much fun, absorb instantly and last all day.

Dior presents the pièce de résistance, Jadore, in a glittering body powder puff exquisitely housed in a magical box fit for a diva.

Burberry's Baby Touch is an irresistible scent especially for yummy mommies – a delicate fragrance in a rock-a-bye bottle with a daisy on top.

As refreshing as a frozen fruit cocktail, 212 Men on Ice from Carolina Herrera is really fresh with its citrus cocktail of grapefruit and mint. The Women's 212 version is equally refreshing and almost invites a cool breeze.

Nina Ricci's classic L'Air du Temps is available this season in a 30-ml spray and 50-ml body lotion – a gorgeous floral.

L'Eau d'Issey from Issey Miyake for men and women are alcohol-free and contain vitamin E. The woman's fragrance is floral, and for your guy, a spicy-woody scent is offered.

Check out Chanel's Coco bath products. The foaming gel is sensational.

Parfums Givenchy introduces a new fragrance for men. It almost redefines the Givenchy tradition of chivalry – a truly gentlemen's scent.

So, like, what's with teens and brand names?

On Sept. 4, 2001, I strutted into the halls of my high school to start my third year there.

I got decked out in my most eclectically hip outfit: a multi-coloured button down shirt, paired with a dirty denim skirt, a vintage pink belt and my favourite flip-flops.

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

I was expecting to have some stylish competition, but when I entered the halls, all I saw was Abercrombie & Fitch, Triple 5 Soul and more Abercrombie & Fitch.

I was appalled at the sight. I wanted to cry. I contemplated fashion genocide. My school was turning into a cheap sci-fi flick!

(What I failed to mention is that my clothes were from, among other places, the Gap and Artizia, just to drop two trendy names.)

So now I wonder: What is the obsession with brand-name clothing? Why are some brands so much more appealing than others? Are such purchases the product of peer pressure?

"Wearing brand names gives people a sense of status and belonging among peers. These clothes make you feel unique, and at the same time you measure up because everyone is wearing the same thing as you," says Tamar Frank, a Grade 11 student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT).

I asked CHAT Grade 9 student Sarah Bregman if she ever feels pressured into buying brand name clothing. She simply replied, "We buy what we like, and what we know will last."

(Bad news – in the ever-changing world of fashion, the last thing you need is clothing that will last. Honestly, do you really want to be wearing the same sweat pants that you were wearing last year? Of course not! And that's precisely why you rush back to buy more.)

Brand names are everywhere, and they seem to define style.

And among most of my peers, style means mass-produced material. The mere fact a well-known symbol or insignia appears on this material makes it alluring, and because of this, people are willing to pay double the price of what the stuff is worth. And all just to look the same as their friends.

Although not always apparent, there are some teenagers willing to break the mould.

Andrew Liss, a Grade 9 student at CHAT, wears brand names, yet he says they are "like an overplayed song. I'm not really going to buy Triple 5 Soul anymore because everyone is wearing it."

The obsession with brand name clothing is as rampant as girls at a Josh Hartnett movie. If you haven't seen the flick, you will find yourself with a desperate urge to see it now. And even if you have seen it, you will have an unexplainable urge to run back and see it again. Get my drift?

Just one more thing, boys and girls. I confess that I am also something of a brand-name consumer. I am no better than the next teenager, except that I read Cosmopolitan and not Teen People.

I pride myself on being original, but, I have to admit, I have a Triple 5 Soul wristband.

C'mon, it was only three bucks.

Wegman's doggy fashion show at AGO

Works of acclaimed American artist William Wegman are currently on display at the Art Gallery of Ontario until July 28, 2002, in the exhibition William Wegman: Fashion Photographs... and More: Works on Paper and Video, 1970 to 2001.

This witty exhibition includes 50 of Wegman's stunning large-format Polaroid photographs and stars a cast of his beloved Weimaraners: Fay Ray, Chundo, Battina, Crooky and Chip. The works feature colour photographs of the subjects posed in chic hats and racy black stilettos, leopard skin bikinis and dramatic blond wigs.

Renowned for his video and photographic works, Wegman is an artist notable for the remarkable breadth of his audience, which ranges from exacting art-world sophisticates to the general public to the very young.

First known for his cutting-edge conceptual art (with or without dog) in the 1970s, he has developed into a virtuoso of many media, including painting and drawing, photography, film and video. His most recent exhibitions include travelling retrospectives in Japan, Scandinavia and the United States, and a large survey of his drawings in France.

"More than anything else, Wegman proves that he is an artist of great originality," said Maia-Mari Sutnik, associate curator of photography at the AGO. "Exploiting a range of media, he expresses the inflections and nuances of high art and popular culture. In this exhibition, his canine performers imaginatively transform the world of haute couture, showing that serious art can resonate humour as well."

The world of fashion is only a jumping off point for Wegman and results in opportunities to see new things. He draws upon the glamour world to feature his famous Weimaraners stylishly outfitted in designer fashions inspired by Jean Paul Gaultier, Issey Miyake, Anna Sui, among other leading designers, yet always evident in Wegman's work is his sharp eye, his strong sense of form, texture, colour, combined with his understanding of content and narrative.

Highlighting this exhibition is a special installation of his early and recent video works, along with a selection of Wegman's drawings and watercolours, from the 1970s to his current "extended postcards" series.

Wegman has noted that drawing is a positive way to spontaneously search new experiences and possibilities with a minimum of means. The AGO has organized the video and works on paper components.

The exhibition Fashion Photographs was organized by the Birmingham Museum of Art. The exhibition has been curated by David Moos and Mary Dinaburg. A book of the same name, published by Harry N. Abrams, accompanies the exhibition.

Survey says business casual is wear it's at

News Canada

Think Canadians are "suiting" up for work? Think again. According to the 2002 Dockers Style Survey, only 7 per cent of working men typically wear a suit and tie to work and nearly 60 per cent of them believe they don't need to wear a suit and tie in order to look professional.

Although many people may think the current economical situation is shifting the workplace dress code back to corporate suits and ties, this trend isn't happening. Only 1 per cent of working men say their company has returned to wearing a suit and tie over the last year.

"We asked Canadians and they told us: the business casual trend remains popular in the work environment," said Yvonne Diesing, Dockers Brand Manager.

"Our research shows that almost half of working Canadians are wearing casual or business casual clothing to work at least 4-5 times a week. The return of the suit doesn't seem to be happening as more than two-thirds believe that business casual clothing in the workplace is here to stay. The attitude towards business casual is changing as more people begin to realize that it is a versatile, comfortable and acceptable solution."

And while a healthy salary and benefit package are always key features for job seekers, survey results discovered that a business casual dress environment is another compelling perk for 54 per cent of working Canadians.

With the recent downturn in the economy, many companies are looking to boost the morale of their employees and results reveal that more than half of working respondents believe morale is higher at the office when people get to wear business casual clothing instead of a traditional suit.

Business casual, once synonymous with golf shirts and khaki pants, is now evolving into a much broader range of clothing options. This may be the reason behind the ongoing popularity of business casual as survey results show 43 per cent of working Canadians believe the look of business casual has become dressier in the past year.

"A pair of dress pants and a crisp, clean button-down shirt can be classified as 'dress casual', an expansion of the business casual category," said Diesing. "This choice of dress provides a very professional look, while maintaining the comfort and versatility."

For people constantly on the go, a business casual wardrobe has more versatility than traditional suits, according to 68 per cent of working Canadians. This is a key feature for most when shopping for clothes. With busy jobs and busy lives, people do not have time to stop and change their clothes after a day at the office.

The Dockers Style Survey also shows 66 per cent believe a business casual wardrobe is versatile enough take them from the office into their everyday, non-work activities.

The Dockers 2002 Style Survey results were gathered in March 2002 through a national telephone Omnibus survey conducted by Thompson Lightstone & Company and was based on a representative sample of 1,000 Canadians.

Look Good Feel Better's Workshop on Wheels

News Canada

For thousands of women living with cancer, managing the appearance-related side effects of cancer treatment can be as challenging as the treatments themselves. Temporary hair loss (including eye brows and lashes), sensitive and discoloured skin, brittle and cracked nails and facial weight gain are only a few of the realities that will face an estimated 67,200 Canadian women this year.

Since 1992, Look Good Feel Better has helped more than 350,000 Canadian women living with cancer to look good and feel better by teaching cosmetic techniques and hair alternatives to help manage the appearance-related side effects of cancer and its treatment. Free, two-hour workshops are offered at 65 hospitals and cancer-care facilities across Canada.

In celebration of its 10th anniversary, the program, which is sponsored by the member companies of the Canadian Cosmetic, Toiletry and Fragrance Association, is traveling across the country with the Workshop on Wheels (WoW), a customized 48-foot trailer replicating a Look Good Feel Better workshop environment. Visiting 20 cities from April until October, the Workshop on Wheels will feature live demonstrations, as program participants and trained volunteers present tips and techniques on makeup, hair alternatives, nail and skin care practices and cosmetic hygiene.

To find out when the Look Good Feel Better Workshop on Wheels will be in a community near you, call toll-free 1-800-914-5665 or visit www.lgfb.ca.

Comic book breaks new ground

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Jews arrived in the American colonies before they won their independence from Britain and morphed into the superpower we know as the United States.

Indeed, the first Jewish settlers reached its shores, via Portugal's colony in Brazil, more than 100 years prior to the 1776 American Revolution.

So the pageantry of American Jewry is one that encompasses the whole story of the United States.

Many books have been written about this topic, but Jews in America: A Cartoon History (The Jewish Publication Society), by David Gantz, breaks new ground.

To the best of my knowledge, it is the first to deal comprehensively with the saga of American Jews through the populistic medium of cartoons.

Gantz, the writer and cartoonist, deals with its social, political, religious and economic dimensions.

Jews in America* examines Jewish history in the United States from a different perspective.

In addition, he focuses on individuals like Haym Salomon, a financier of the American Revolution; Oscar Straus, the first Jew in the cabinet; Abraham Cahan, the crusading Yiddish newspaper editor, and Henry Kissinger, the first Jewish secretary of state.

Although Jews have done extremely well by America, they have tasted its bitter fruits as well.

Gantz, in taking note of its xenophobic nativist movements and its Judeophobic strains, mentions a litany of anti-Semitic incidents that have stained American democracy.

Among his other themes are Jews and the civil rights movement, the United States and Israel and intermarriage.

Comic book history of the Jews in America

Gantz is a fine illustrator and his explanatory panels are pithy and occasionally humorous.

Jews in America is the kind of book children and adults alike can enjoy and savour.

New York: Capital of Photographs (Yale University Press and the Jewish Museum) looks at a vibrant American city by way of 110 duotones and 15 colour photos and text by Max Kozloff, Karen Levitov and Johanna Goldfeld.

Since many of the photographers, from Alfred Stieglitz to Nan Goldin, are Jewish, this expressive volume unfolds through a Jewish sensibility.

We're treated to vivid photographs of varied scenes, ranging from the Lower East Side and Ellis Island to the Staten Island ferry approaching Manhattan's inimitable skyline.

New York, like Jews in America, is informative, educational and entertaining.

What more can one ask?

Israeli flag footballers coming to Toronto

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — They play football in Israel. Not the kick it back and forth, back and forth and maybe-get-a-shot-on-goal variety, but the four-down, forward-pass version of American flag football.

Flag football has a long way to go in Israel before it eclipses the popularity of the game North Americans know as soccer, but in only three years, the Jewish State has developed a flag football program that allows it to compete with the elite at the international level.

The Israeli national team will be coming to three-down country for the World Championship of Flag Football, which will be held in Toronto from Aug. 15-19.

Flag football is similar to touch football, except that players wear detachable plastic flags that must be removed by an opponent in lieu of tackling them. In touch football, an opponent must touch the ball-carrier with both hands.

At the flag football World Cup, held in February in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., Israel racked up a 1-4 record, finishing sixth out of seven entries, ahead only of winless France.

Israel's one victory was over England, which it stunned 12-0 in its first ever international game of flag football. England rebounded and went on to win the bronze medal, behind Canada's silver and the United States' gold.

"Israel's team is comprised of an exceptional group of highly motivated amateur athletes," says Steve Leibowitz, president and team manager of the Israeli squad. "Players include both American Jewish immigrants and native-born sabras who learned football in Israel."

Players are drawn from the American Touch Football in Israel (ATFI) league, which includes 40 teams and 700 players in the greater Jerusalem area.

In Fort Lauderdale, the Israeli team was led by quarterback Ron Dermer, a columnist with the Jerusalem Post. Dermer's brother is David Dermer, mayor of Miami Beach and the connection was useful in helping the Israeli players develop a relationship with the local Jewish community during their stay in South Florida.

"In addition to playing in the championship, the team looks forward to meeting with groups from the Toronto Jewish community. The team has set aside time for engagements with the Jewish and non-Jewish communities," Leibowitz stated.

For more information, Leibowitz can be reached by fax at: 972-2-579-0910, or by e-mail at: kraftstadium@yahoo.com.

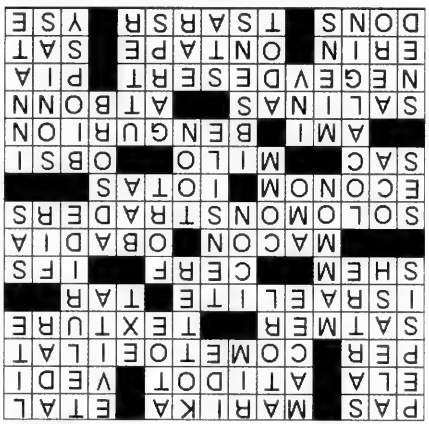
FLIP OVER FOR ANSWERS TO CROSSWORD.



Fifth official's arrest raises tension in soccer circles

By BARUCH KRA
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Yohanan Cibuteru, a senior referee who has officiated in key matches in the Premier League, was arrested by police recently and questioned about his alleged involvement in the match-fixing scandal which is currently engulfing Israeli soccer.

Cibuteru is the fifth soccer official questioned by the police's international serious crime unit, which has been carrying out an under-cover investigation for the past four months.

Police admitted they had struck a deal with one former referee, Moshe Atias, who has agreed to turn state's evidence. Atias, one of the four original men whose arrest was made public last week, was released after one day, but police will keep a close eye on him and will monitor the people who make contact with him.

After the news of the investigation became public, close surveillance was kept on Cibuteru and other suspects who are due to be arrested. The police are timing the arrests to fall at various times. Not all the men involved have yet been hauled in for questioning. One of the police's ploys is to monitor the actions of the men who do not yet know they are suspects.

Cibuteru is the first high-profile name to join the four other arrested men – retired officials Sabi Elnekaveh, Haim Mirovsky and Moshe Atias and Barik Tahsin, who is still active as a linesman in the lower divisions. The police suspect Cibuteru of collusion with Mirovsky in a game during the late 1990s as well as other games during that period, but the detectives are not ruling out foul play during the current season as well.

The police revealed they had arrested the first four officials when they arrived at Petah Tikva Magistrates' Court to have their remand extended. The police investigation came about following a report last November when Niv Raskin of Army Radio said he had uncovered firm evidence that senior officials had been involved in fixing the results of matches. The police claim the officials received hefty sums of money to deliver tailor-made results for illegal betting rings, with sums ranging into millions of dollars.

Tat-Nitzav Moshe Levin, the head of the international serious crimes unit warned that more arrests were imminent.

A diamond among jagged rocks

Left, right, centre

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

In the summer of 1973, following my bar mitzvah, my father, of blessed memory, rented a cottage in Wasaga Beach for the family to vacation in.

Every day, he and I would climb into a rowboat, paddle the river and study Talmud in preparation for my first year in yeshiva.

Throughout the summer, we would discuss daf bet in Tractate Baba Batra, dealing with the complexity of erecting a wall, and the variance of opinions on responsibility should that wall collapse.

For a 13-year-old kid, my "Stand by Me" summer had been a cerebral one, sort of a welcome into the people-of-the-Book club. It was a long, hot summer, but in September, I entered yeshiva knowing daf bet by heart, as well as the physics of a wall made from lime.

It has been more than 2½ decades since my last day in yeshiva. I have spent those years on a journey, an expedition down roads of divergent philosophies into the world of secular thought, art and culture.

Through my discovery of my own Walden Pond, I have been able to unravel much of the beauty in the teachings I rejected following my stint in yeshiva. Further, I have come to realize that my rebellion against Judaism and Torah was largely in response to the method and mindset in which they were taught to me, rather than the content itself.

I still have great philosophical problems with aspects of Judaism, yet in spite of this I can now sense the rainbow of colours within the multi-generational arguments of the Talmud and the kaleidoscope of truth-shapes emanating from the Five Books of Moses.

I know now that Judaism and Torah could have been infinitely more exhilarating and useful in my life, had they been presented to me in a poetic way, rather than held overhead like Mount Sinai, a symbol of control more than it is a breath of possibility, humility, love and tolerance.

My Torah education was dehydrated. It lacked intellectual and existential moisture. For hours on end, my yeshiva class would study the micro-intricacies of determining the quantity of matzot one must eat on Pesach while never dealing with its meaning to the human condition or its relationship to Pesach's slavery-versus-freedom theme.

While it seemed reasonable that the science of our existence was crucial to unscrambling truth, I craved knowing its soul. I wanted to be challenged by a multiplicity of ideas that were relevant to me. I didn't find either in Torah study.

Ideas are exciting. Uncovering truth is splendid and breathtaking. I discovered this through my sister, Naomi, and her husband, Rabbi Benjamin Hecht. The Torah is a cache of ideas. Abraham's perilous monotheistic journey is a good example of this, as is the concept of sh'luach ha'kane – the Jewish obligation of sending away a mother bird before grabbing her eggs from the nest, a powerful and inspirational commandment that speaks to our relationship with God and animals.

Whether you accept Torah as truth or as a compendium of knowledge that is useful for the development of a value-based world, Jews need to weave its teaching in a more masterful way so that it reflects the dimensions of possibility and real relevancy and rivets us to the ground as the dusk does for a poet.

If we do not inject this sizzling dynamic of life into Judaism, and learn Torah with the gritty enthusiasm of a deal-maker, many Jews will keep on running at the mention of Torah study, and other currently committed Jews will reject Judaism as a viable life choice.

There is a splendid diamond wedged amongst the jagged rocks.

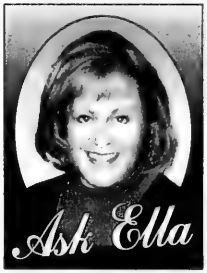
About Life



Dear Ella,

We have had a subscription to the Toronto Star for as long as we have been married. I have always found its reporting on the Middle East to be biased and when I heard that the Jewish funeral homes Benjamin's and Steeles took a stand by pulling out their funeral announcements, I decided it was time for me to take a stand too. I cancelled my subscription and told the paper exactly why I was doing so.

When my husband came home and I very proudly told him what I had done, he was furious. He said he reads the Star for many reasons, including for its Middle East coverage. He works in a very multicultural office and feels that if he is not informed on exactly what is written in the papers, he cannot discuss the topic intelligently and make others understand the whole story. I guess that makes sense. However, I feel we must unite and not sit idly by and ignore the coverage.

Reach for the Star

Dear Reach for the Star

This is a very heated topic and I know many others who have also cancelled their subscriptions in unity with Benjamin's and Steeles. People want to prove a point and don't want their dollars to go to a newspaper that reports the news with a slant. There is too much at stake. There are even advertisers that have pulled their ads because of the way the Star has historically reported on the Middle East.

The problem here is that you made a unilateral decision to cancel your subscription without discussing it first with your husband. He obviously reads this paper regularly and should have been involved in the decision to cancel the paper.

Whether you should renew your subscription is a decision you have to make together. If he feels he must read the Star to stay informed, then maybe he can pick it up at the store or read it online or maybe borrow a paper at work.

You and your husband have to get together on this and make a joint decision. Take the time to sit down and discuss it. It's important.

Israel Emergency Campaign Report

Anna's Story

Imagine surviving the death of your teenage daughter. Now imagine the life of Dr. Anna Kazachkova.

On June 1, 2001, a suicide bomber murdered Anna's 15 year old daughter, Anya, together with 20 other teenagers at Tel Aviv's Dolphinarium disco. Anna, a doctor by profession, and a 39 year old widow with a 12 year old son, had emigrated to Israel shortly before her daughter's death.

Volunteers from Selah, the Israel Crisis Management Centre, offered unlimited compassion - meeting her at the morgue, remaining with her during shiva, helping her handle painful bureaucratic details, arranging grief counseling, assisting her when she had to move to a new apartment and finding funds to purchase new appliances.

Today, nearly a year later, Anna and her son require constant companionship and support. Although she's looking forward to Alexander's bar mitzvah, Anna has difficulty concentrating on her medical studies so she can practice in Israel.

Anna, unfortunately, shares a common trauma with thousands of mothers, fathers, sons and daughters throughout Israel.

UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003 is dedicated to Anna, over 3,000 other victims of terror and the social service network which makes their daily lives bearable, by placing hope on the horizon.

Our community has already contributed nearly $13 million additional dollars to Israel Emergency Campaign 2003, which will be designated for:

- Assistance for victims of terror and their families
- Increased security for children in day cares, kindergartens and other facilities
- Increased medical and psychological support plus other human services for those most affected by the crisis, particularly the poor, the elderly and new immigrants

Graham endorses IDF move

Bethlehem incursion 'helpful if designed to deal with terrorist menace'

CJN News Services and Staff

JERUSALEM — Canada's Foreign Minister Bill Graham gave a qualified endorsement of Israel's military operations against terrorist operations in the West Bank after a meeting Monday with Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres.

Responding to a reporter's question about the Israel Defence Forces' re-entry into Bethlehem on Monday for the second time in a week, Graham said such moves "can be helpful if in fact they are specifically designed to deal with the terrorist menace."

Graham's statement seemed to be part of an effort to clarify the impression created by Canadian media reports of Graham's meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon the night before. The reports said Graham clashed with Sharon over Israeli policies concerning travel restrictions on the Palestinians.

On Monday, Graham said that Canada recognizes "the need for Israel to have its security and it must take actions to ensure security. What we urge upon Israel is to ensure that the actions that ultimately are taken will be those that enable people to move freely in that area, to re-establish their economy, to have prosperity so that they can be neighbours with dignity to Israel."

He added that "dealing with terrorism is one dimension of the problem. Making sure that individual Palestinians are not punished in a way which makes them greater enemies of the process is another part of the problem."

The News In Brief

CANADA

BGU Award

TORONTO — Ben-Gurion University of the Negev recently awarded the Toronto Prize of Excellence in Research to two outstanding young researchers in the faculty of natural sciences. For the 2001-02 academic year, the award was given to Dr. Amnon Besser of the department of mathematics and Dr. Bilha Segev of the department of chemistry. The Toronto prize was established by the Toronto chapter of BGU to recognize outstanding achievement in science and technology, medicine or the humanities, and the partnership between the university and support from individuals and corporations in the Toronto area.

ISRAEL

Arafat's Popularity

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's popularity is slipping, a new poll shows. The poll, conducted earlier this month by the Palestinian Center for Policy and Survey Research, says Arafat has the support of 35 per cent of Palestinians, versus 46 per cent in July 2000, before the outbreak of the intifadah. Marwan Barghouti, the leader of West Bank militias who is now in an Israeli jail, was chosen as the second most popular Palestinian figure.

Pageant Boycott

JERUSALEM — Miss Lebanon is boycotting this year's Miss Universe pageant, saying she will not participate alongside Miss Israel, Yamit Har-Noy, who is a 20-year-old member of the Israel Defense Forces. Miss Lebanon's decision is "very distressing. It is only a beauty pageant," Miss Israel said of the competition, slated to take place May 29 in Puerto Rico. "It has nothing to do with politics."

Doors Locked

JERUSALEM — Israeli restaurants have adopted a new measure to deter suicide bombers: lock them out. Restaurants and cafes around the country have begun locking their doors and admitting diners only after an inspection. Restaurant owners said they adopted the tactic after clients complained that the security guards now posted outside most establishments are insufficient.

Bomber 'Disguised'

JERUSALEM — The suicide bomber who carried out the Passover massacre was disguised as a woman, Israeli newspapers reported May 16. Ha'aretz and Yediot Achronot based their reports on the testimony of Abbas Sayad, the Hamas commander in Tulkarm, who was arrested recently by Israeli forces. Along with admitting that he masterminded the attack, Sayad told interrogators that the bomber, Abdel Bassat Odeh, shaved his beard, put on makeup and a wig, and wore high-heels when carrying out the March 27 attack in a Netanya hotel.

WORLD

Irving Must Pay

LONDON — British Holocaust denier David Irving has failed to have a bankruptcy order against him overturned. Irving was declared bankrupt by the High Court last month after he failed to pay Penguin Books some $213,000 (US), part of the publisher's legal costs. Last week, a judge ruled nothing is preventing Irving from paying his damages. In a highly publicized case here in 2000, Irving lost his lawsuit against scholar Deborah Lipstadt and her publisher, Penguin, after a book by Lipstadt accused him of being a Holocaust denier. Irving was ordered at the time to pay Lipstadt's legal costs, estimated at nearly $3 million. The ruling ruined him financially.

Pearl's Memory

LOS ANGELES — Judea Pearl, a world-renowned computer scientist and father of slain Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl, has donated $15,000 (US) he received from a top scientific award to a foundation established to perpetuate his son's ideals. In a related development, the Los Angeles Press Club has announced the establishment of the Daniel Pearl Award for Courage and Integrity. The first award will be presented posthumously on June 22 to the slain journalist. Pearl's parents will accept it.

Streams Unite

NEW YORK — The four major Jewish streams in the United States are folding their individual fund-raising efforts for Israel into a broad emergency campaign. The joint campaign sponsored by the United Jewish Communities (UJC), the umbrella group of North American Jewish federations, is a "show of unity among the streams of Judaism that is not seen often enough," Harvey Blitz, president of the Orthodox Union, said at a news conference. Leaders of the Reform, Conservative, Orthodox and Reconstructionist movements pledged their support for UJC's Israel Emergency Campaign, which aims to raise $300 million (US) for needs arising from the Mideast violence.

Mandela's Employer

JOHANNESBURG — Lazar Sidelsky, a Jewish lawyer who gave a young Nelson Mandela a job as a clerk, has died here at age 90. Taking on a young black man as a clerk was "something almost unheard of in those days," Mandela later wrote of his time with the law firm of Witkin, Sidelsky and Eidelman. Three years ago, Mandela honored Sidelsky and his "first white friend," Nat Bregman, who worked for the firm with Mandela, at a kosher lunch at Mandela's home here.

'Disturbing' Rise in Anti-Semitism: League

MONTREAL — The preliminary numbers compiled for the 2002 audit of anti-Semitic incidents by the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada shows a disturbing increase in anti-Semitism across Canada, the league says.

The recent pipe bombing of the Quebec City synagogue is the sixth incident this year in the province targeting synagogues. It indicates a "disturbing" trend of increasing violence in the type of incidents being reported to the league this year.

From January to the end of April 2002, 110 anti-Semitic incidents were reported to the league, compared to 286 incidents Canada-wide for April 2001. In April 2002 alone, the league received 75 reports of anti-Semitic incidents, 25 of which took place in Quebec. This compares to 25

'Bias' in Mideast project found in public school

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Parents and Jewish community leaders have expressed concern about a Grade 5 school project handed out to students at Summit Heights Public School last week that they say presents a biased view of the Mideast conflict.

The students were asked by their teacher to read an overview of Israel's War on Terrorism, presented in the form of a current events newsletter, and then complete a worksheet and crossword puzzle.

Simon Rosenblum, director of public policy for Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, said "the overview presents an incredibly biased and one-sided view of the conflict."

In a statement, CJC said the "newsletter exaggerated the number of Palestinians killed in Jenin, repeating false propaganda about the recent fighting that has now been debunked by Human Rights Watch and all other credible sources."

(The assignment repeated Palestinian claims that "at least 500 people, including civilians" were killed in Jenin.)

Ed Morgan, chair of CJC, Ontario region, said that by exaggerating ten-fold Human Rights Watch's estimated casualty figure in Jenin, the newsletter presents a new version of old-fashioned blood libels.

"It plays to the anti-Semitic idea that the Jews will commit bloodthirsty acts to advance their own causes," Morgan noted.

CJC also expressed concern that the assignment refers to suicide bombers as "militants" instead of terrorists and presents Israel as the only obstacle to peace by stating that "at the root of the conflict between the Palestinians and the Israelis is the Palestinians' desire for an independent country and Israel's reluctance to give up control of the territories."

The assignment was taken from What's New in the World?, an online resource program published by British-Columbia based LesPlan Educational Services. Lesson plans are made available to school boards across Canada on a monthly basis.

Aliza Eisentein, a parent of one of the Grade 5 students, was upset by the perspective presented by the assignment and with the way allegations were presented to the children as facts.

"I was distressed by the total bias. There was no mention at all of Israel's point of view," said Eisentein.

Many parents said the teacher in this situation did alert the children to the fact that this worksheet only presented one point of view.

The teacher told them not to answer four out of the six questions on the worksheet because they were leading questions, said Fran Michaels, who is also a parent of one of the Grade 5 students.

However, some educators question the ability of 10- and 11-year-olds to fully understand differences between varying perspectives on an issue.

"Grade 5 students could understand perspective or bias if their curriculum trained them to do it," said Seymour Epstein, director of the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education.

If the concept were presented to them repeatedly, then Grade 5 students could eventually understand that the material they are studying is not necessarily factual but a representation of a different point of view, he said.

However, Epstein noted that issues of perspective are usually taught to junior or high school students and he questioned whether this worksheet was prepared with that objective in mind.

At Summit Heights, many of the students are from homes where Middle East policies are discussed and the kids would be sensitive to the issues involved, Michaels said, adding that she would be especially concerned about other classrooms where the material from this lesson would be presented as fact.

CJC has called on the Toronto District School Board (TDSB) to investigate the matter fully and to provide some "professional guidance" to Jewish and Israeli students in the school who have been "subjected to this form of vilification."

Gerry Connelly, the TDSB associate director for student and community services, said the board has not yet been able to determine how prevalent the material is in the system.

However, she said it is the board's expectation that all materials used in classrooms be balanced and bias-free and that the TDSB will be re-examining this curriculum to ensure that it meets existing standards.

Israel offers carrot, not just stick to Palestinians, says Gissin

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Ra'anan Gissin, senior adviser to Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, is surprisingly optimistic about the odds of re-educating Palestinian youth for peaceful co-existence with Israel, but he is not impressed by Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's recent call for reform under his rule.

"Arafat is a master of deceit and duplicity," he said bluntly.

But what Gissin refers to as the continuous brainwashing of young Palestinians is reversible, he said in an interview last week. "We also need to educate our people, particularly after this war, that there are human beings on the other side who want to live in peace," he added.

Gissin was in town for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Walk With Israel, held on Victoria Day, when he addressed the crowd gathered for a festival at Skydome following the walk.

He came prepared to encourage the Israel supporters and assuage their fears, but instead he found himself encouraged by the crowd, he told The CJN the following day at the Royal York Hotel, where he spoke at a parlour meeting.

The best thing Diaspora Jews can do right now to support Israel, Gissin said, is to go there. "It's important for Israelis to get the feeling that we're not alone."

Israelis, he noted, are only the custodians of the land. "It's incumbent on every Jew to lend support to the State of Israel."

If Israel is weakened, he warned, Jews everywhere in the free world would be affected. "It would be a totally different world, a throwback to the 1930s."

The people of Israel are committed to peace, although they are divided about how to achieve it, Gissin said.

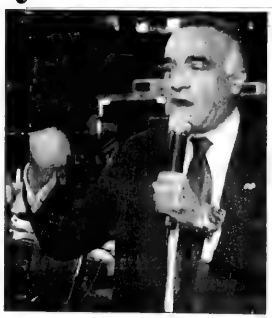
Sharon's plan includes a regional conference that would include Arab countries in a "peace coalition," he said, mentioning among others Iran, Iraq, Saudi Arabia and Syria. "These countries need peace as much as Israel," but deep-seated animosities will require a "period of decontamination," he added.

Ironically, Gissin noted, "those who want peace must prepare for war." The peace agreements between Israel and Egypt, and between Israel and Jordan, came about as a result of "lack of military options" on the other countries' parts regarding Israel, he said.

"The same thing will happen [with the Palestinians]. It just takes longer. More and more Palestinians are realizing that this is a futile effort; they pay dearly for it. I think then there will be a lot of pressure for Arafat to change."

Sporting a lapel pin depicting the Israeli and American flags, Gissin noted that Israel is invoking the same right of self-defence as the United States is in Afghanistan.

"We're fighting for ourselves, but we believe it's very important that all the free, civilized world unite behind the leadership of the president of the United States for taking this courageous decision in fighting terrorism until victory. There's no other way. If we don't fight terrorism today, we will fight nuclear weapons tomorrow."



Ra'anan Gissin

The idea of Israel building a fence or a buffer zone is "important in some places," but not would not be an effective deterrent to attacks in others, said Gissin. "When you have limited resources, [it's better] to put them into intelligence systems and deterrent systems, rather than in physical barriers. We're balancing it."

Jews and Arabs have lived together for more than 100 years, he said. "The two peoples are destined to live together. We just have to find the right type of relationship where they are not at our throats. That has to be achieved through education, through the use of deterrents, through making it very costly for them to cross, and through other measures like creating working opportunities and jobs in the territories. It's not all stick. It's carrot too."

For things to change, there has to be economic co-operation, a complete cessation of violence, and an overhaul of the Palestinian Authority, Gissin said. There is a movement within Palestinian society asking for real reforms, he added.

"It won't happen tomorrow. We need to have patience."

Support a Soldier.
Support a Student. Support Israel.

Yes, we are in an emergency mode and we need your help. As you can see by these letters from 2 students, about 1500 students have been called up for army service. The University has decided each student will receive the equivalent of $500 CDN to help them to complete their year. We ask you to sponsor as many students as possible. Remember the future of the State of Israel depends on educated people, our only natural resource.

Mr. Stephen Victor
CFHU National President

Dear Stephen:

My name is Eli Novershtern. I am 26 years old and was born and raised in Jerusalem. I'm presently a third-year student enrolled in a combined Philosophy, Political Science and Economics major. I also participate in Amirim, HU's honors program, and work part-time at the Bank of Israel. It's a hectic schedule but I really enjoy my courses, my job in the financial sector, and my extracurricular activities: I chair HU's Debating Society. We are scheduled to attend a major debating meet in two weeks, which is provoking great excitement. However, I am an officer in the IDF and the meet coincides with my call to active duty.

Frankly, it can be psychologically hard to delay life plans—some students have to put their academic and professional careers on hold; others sacrifice their part-time jobs, and some postpone getting married. Still, we're all proud that IDF student reservists are so heavily responsible for Israel's security. A number of my friends at the University have been drafted, and it really pleases us that Hebrew University is creating a stipend for students being called up. As far as I know, our University is the first and only educational institution to offer an allowance which will enable many of us to graduate on time, or near our desired graduation date. The Hebrew University is a pioneer in many ways. To me, it's the flagship of the Zionist movement. There aren't many institutions with the ability to help the Jewish people and to promote education, culture and religion in the modern sense. Hebrew University fulfills what Israel and the Jewish people need.

I have just learned that the Canadian Friends are assisting the University in providing these stipends. Please accept my thanks for all your efforts. The money will help us with photocopying, textbooks and tutoring. It's also a morale boosting type of support. I believe that Israel will overcome the conflict, and we students in the IDF are proud to be serving. It means a great deal to know that you are also proud of us.

Sincerely,

Eli Novershtern

Mr. Stephen Victor
CFHU National President

Dear Stephen,

I am pursuing a Master's degree in History at Hebrew University, where I received my undergraduate degree in Journalism and History. In Israel, the expected level of education is very high and therefore combined degrees are so important. Hebrew University offers academically serious and prestigious programs in my field, and offers me the best opportunity for success. I am taking three classes this semester and also work full-time as a journalist for a news site on the web. But when I get a 9:00 a.m. call: "Shlomo, come to the army base now. "I'm there by 10:30. On duty I'm surrounded by thousands of soldiers, many from Hebrew University.

I must admit that going from sleeping in a tent to sitting in a classroom challenges our concentration. Sometimes when we return to school we feel out of orbit because we've missed many classes and course material. When the University set aside funds for those of us in the IDF, it gave us a good feeling. The action demonstrated the University's willingness to help and created a spirit of togetherness. It's also a financial necessity. Many of us struggle tremendously to afford our educations.

When contributions are made by the Canadian Friends, the gesture is special in ways I find difficult to describe. Having Jews from around the world reach out to us is an action of solidarity that has great meaning.

My career objective is to remain actively involved in current events and the media. Visitors to our web site are mainly people outside of Israel, and communicating the news and Israel's point of view gives me a sense of mission. I thank Hebrew University and our diaspora friends for supporting my goals.

Sincerely,

Shlomo Blass

Doctor tells of Israeli hospital life since September 2000

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Although she serves as an adviser to Israel's minister of health, it was as a private citizen and hospital staff member that Dr. Rachel Adato-Levy spoke at a recent fund-raising event for victims of terror in Israel.

Her hospital work involves "all kinds of conflicts and tragedies," said the mother of two boys, ages 16 and 12, and the deputy medical director of Shaare Zedek Hospital in Jerusalem. The hospital has treated more than 400 terror attack victims since September 2000.

Speaking at Beth Tzedec Congregation, Adato-Levy described some of the typical scenes at her hospital immediately following a terrorist attack. Even when she's not on duty, she is available by cellphone and beeper, as are all her colleagues and a horde of volunteers who are ready to rush to the hospital as soon as they are called.

The man in charge of air conditioning moves patients on stretchers into the emergency room (he once moved his own injured daughter), while some of the other volunteers field hundreds of calls from people looking for loved ones, Adato-Levy said.

One hospital employee was working upstairs when her daughter was brought into the emergency room. She died, said Adato-Levy. "As a big family [the way the staff feel about each other], we knew already what the mother didn't know. You need a lot of courage to go upstairs and tell the mother her life has just changed."

There is a Palestinian physician who works in the emergency room, treating both Jewish and Arab patients, Adato-Levy said. "He's terrific." But when travelling from East Jerusalem on urgent calls, he was delayed at police barriers. "We had to arrange a special card for him, because he's very important."

On the same floor as the Palestinian doctor is a colleague who made aliyah from France, she continued. The French physician, who treats Arab and Jewish children, lost his own son in a shooting incident. "You have to live with all these complications," Adato-Levy said.

In a separate address following Adato-Levy's, the synagogue's Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl spoke of his great pride in Israel, which crystallized for him during a recent conversation with an exhausted Israeli hospital physician who had spent the night treating patients, including members of Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's private guard. None of the many Israelis to whom he spoke have said they hate Arabs, the rabbi reported.

When an attack occurs, the first thought is, "Where are my kids?" Adato-Levy said.

And as hard as it is for parents, the kids suffer more, she noted. "There's been a big change in Israeli life. There are no trips at school, no camps during Pesach or in the summer. We keep telling them to call every hour. Even my 12-year-old has a cellular phone. I need to find out where he's going, with whom he's going, how far from home he'll be. That's how we run our lives."

Parents who are "more extreme" allow their children only to travel to school and back. She wonders how the restrictions will affect children in the long run; in the short run, she said, it has strained parent-child relationships.

Israelis, in general, are less optimistic than they have been, Adato-Levy said. "We don't know if the worst part is behind us or ahead of us, and that's what is so frightening."

The uncertainty is the worst part, she said. "What keeps us going is the knowledge that we don't have any other home. That's our [country]."

Zareinu Moveathon to aid kids with special needs

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Whether participants in the upcoming Zareinu Moveathon amble through a 2-km course in Earl Bales Park or undertake a 100-km cycling route from Kleinburg to Toronto, they'll all be working together to help Zareinu Educational Centre, a 14-year-old school for children with developmental and physical disabilities including Down syndrome, autism and cerebral palsy.

Scheduled for June 9

The annual event, now in its fifth year, is scheduled for June 9. It offers a number of ways to participate for cyclists, runners and other "movers," and will include a community picnic at the park, complete with inflatable playground, carnival games, prizes and food vendors.

Cyclists have the option of a 100-km masters ride, a 50-km challenge ride, or a 20-km family bike ride. There is also a 20-km girls' ride, and a 30-km boys' ride, as well as a 10-km run. The separate boys' ride is scheduled to follow Sunday yeshiva classes, and the girls' ride is scheduled earlier in the morning.

In all, about 5,000 people, including more than 150 cyclists, are expected to take part, said moveathon co-ordinator Shaindy Cohen Goldstein.

The 100-km registrants will be bused to Kleinburg, and will meet up with the 50-km participants at York University. Support vans and professional riders will accompany the groups. "We want to make it as safe, easy and enjoyable as possible," said Cohen Goldstein.

The event will fund therapies, equipment and "hopefully, soon, a new building," she said. Zareinu, which serves students from age 1 month to 12 years, is currently housed in the Sephardic Kehilla Centre.

"It's a very one-on-one-type of school," Cohen Goldstein said. "They have cutting edge therapies. It's such a privilege to do an event for Zareinu."

For further information, call 416-661-1800 or go to www.zareinu.org.

FAMILY MATTERS WALKATHON: More than 200 walkers of all ages recently took part in a 7-kilometre walkathon that raised $4,500 in support of Jewish Family & Child Services. Temple Emanu-El sponsored the event, which began at the Banbury Community Centre with songs by the nine-member junior choir. For the record, two 14-month-olds tied for honours as the youngest to complete the route!

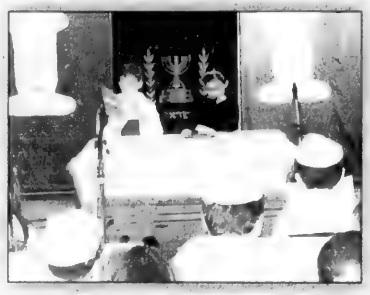
The School of Choice

Turning students on to reading is the goal of every school. The staff at Associated came up with a unique idea. Students would be sponsored for every page they read, whether in books or magazines, in English, Hebrew, French or Russian.

The result was an outstanding success, with over one million pages read by students from senior kindergarten to grade eight. In the process, students raised $100,000 to support vital services in Israel, reinforcing the message that Associated stands for a commitment to Torah values, Israel and the community.

"It's a fantastic school," says Lou Greenbaum, president of Associated Hebrew Schools. "It's clearly the community school of choice and we hope to continue to maintain its position and stature."

The school is evolving to meet the needs of both its students and their parents.



A just-published comprehensive Statement of Information includes detailed curriculum outlines and learning expectations, along with school policies. Newly formatted report cards reflect the requirements of the Ministry of Education.

Special talents co-ordinators advise teachers on how to provide additional stimulation within the classroom for students with exceptional abilities. A new anti-bullying policy is being monitored, as well as new policies regarding student health. Graduates are undergoing a survey to assess their preparedness for high school. A manual to help separated and divorced families is in development.

It's part of the school's mandate to be open to communication in order to be a forward-thinking establishment. "As good a school as we are," says Greenbaum, "we have an obligation to the community, to our parents and to ourselves to strive to do better."

Associated understands that the future of the Jewish community is in the hands of its children. "Children are the future of our people and the only way for them to stay committed is for them to receive a quality Jewish education," says Rabbi Abraham Soffer, Educational Director. "We're giving them the knowledge to begin to make their own choices in life and to choose their own path.

"When we have over 90% of our students registering to study in a Jewish high school, we know we're doing the right thing."

Arthur Landa, Executive Director, says that as a result of careful management and planning, Associated has no external debt, and therefore offers one of the lowest tuitions of any Hebrew day school in the city. Five years from now, if the government upholds the education tax credit and charitable tax receipt, Landa hopes that parents who are sending their children to public schools will view Jewish day schools as a more viable choice than ever before. The school continues to stand by its pledge that any child who wants a Jewish education will be given the opportunity, regardless of their economic means. "We're trying to do whatever we can to ensure that high quality Jewish education is an option for anyone who wants it," says Landa.

For more information on choosing the best education for your child, please call Associated's Admissions and Tuition office: (416) 494-7666, ext. 323.

Jewish homeless shelter in the planning stages

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Lillian Freedman [Ron Csillag photo]

Lillian Freedman's dream of a permanent shelter for the Jewish homeless is perhaps a step closer to reality, now that her own experiment shows there's a need for such a facility.

Quietly and with no fanfare, Freedman, a freelance social worker, opened a short-term, transitionary home for Jewish homeless earlier this spring. Located at 87 Mackay Ave., a quiet sidestreet in the Dufferin-St. Clair area, the modest three-bedroom house was home to four people before the three-month pilot project wrapped up this month. All the residents have since settled into more stable and long-term situations.

"I did it to prove to the community that it can be done," said Freedman, something of gadfly in Jewish social service circles, "and to show that it should be done." She calls it her "quiet experiment."

Freedman has been on the front lines of the issue since 1998, when she was contracted by Jewish Family & Child Service (JF & CS) to find homeless Jews, in addition to the ones JF & CS knew about and was tending to. She located about a dozen people who were either out on the street, facing eviction or staying with friends or relatives. Most were found accommodations.

But all along, Freedman envisioned a different approach: A permanent, freestanding, fully kosher shelter where homeless Jews can stay and take advantage of volunteered professional services, as part of their eventual reintegration into society. That dream has been an uphill battle, she sighs, for a variety of reasons involving bureaucracy and inertia.

Things turned in February, when the owners of 87 Mackay agreed to lease the Victorian house to Freedman for her project. In short order, clients filled the rooms: A young man originally from Albania who had been a medical student; two older women who came from other shelters; and a young woman en route to Israel from South America, stranded here with little money, an expired visa and nowhere to go.

Freedman rented the house for $2,000 a month, plus utilities and found donated furniture. JF&CS paid first and last months' rent for the two older women, who got to keep their disability cheques. The Albanian man received $400 a month in welfare payments, and the South American woman had all of $200.

The whole project cost roughly $9,000. Of that, Freedman reckons nearly $3,000 came from her own pocket, including supplementing grocery purchases and incidentals.

"It was a big expense and a big headache with no meaningful backing," she said without a hint of bitterness. "But it was all part of my own learning curve."

Some community help, however, seems to be finally on the way. Recently, Freedman met with Bruce Gilboord, who has been active in the fight for Jewish day school funding. Gilboord, in turn, has interested some members of his synagogue, Mizrachi Bayit, in the project.

They have also brought the endeavour to B'nai Brith Canada (BBC), which views the idea of a Jewish homeless shelter favourably, according to Pearl Gladman, national director of BBC's Centre for Community Action.

The task at hand, Gladman said, is to come up with a budget and present it to BBC's board of directors.

The parties, a loose coalition still in its infancy, include several mental health and real estate professionals willing to donate their services, said Gilboord. More volunteer expertise is needed, he noted.

"The project is doable. It's just a question of making the right shidduch [match] with the right people."

The group is already searching for a building. Ideally, Gilboord said, it would have 20 private suites, a kitchen and offices, and would be located away from the Bathurst Street strip to avoid the stigma of a "Jewish poorhouse."

The goal is a comfortable, non-threatening, kosher residence where homeless could stay for up to three months and have access to medical and dental care, a pharmacist, a social worker, drug and alcohol counselling, even help with job searches and resume writing.

"The need is obviously there. One just has to scratch the surface," Gilboord said.

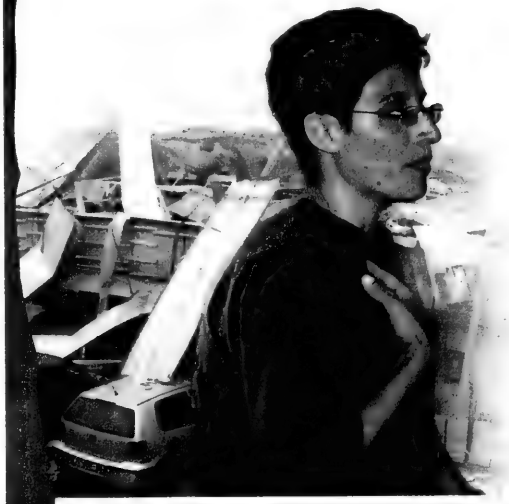
Or one can talk to one of the Jewish women who landed in Freedman's residence. Sarah (not her real name) is 58 and suffered, she said, 39 years of abuse at the hands of her husband. She has five children and nine grandchildren and has reconciled with an estranged son. She is now in a retirement/boarding home and is on a waiting list for assisted housing.

"They say Jewish men don't drink or abuse their wives," Sarah said, adding calmly, "That's bull----."

But pointing to Freedman, Sarah said, "She helped save my life."

Anyone wishing to get involved can contact Gilboord at 416-709-2902.

Israel Emergency Campaign Report



The story of Meish

The song is beautiful, almost mystical. Shema Yisrael by Israeli songstress Sarit Hadad. The song that Moshe Yedid-Levi – Meish to his family and friends – listened to over and over before a suicide killer murdered Meish and 10 other innocents at the Ben Yehuda Mall on December 1, last year. Meish would be alive today if he hadn't tried to help his cousin who was injured in the first bomb blast that night. Meish died during the second explosion. He was only 19.

Today, his mother, Anat, cries whenever she hears Shema Yisrael, especially its painful refrain Hear, Israel, my G-d, now I am alone.

Anat has returned to work, but her husband Ya'acov cannot get through his daily routine. Their other two sons, Tal and Adam, are absorbed in competitive swimming at an Israeli youth village where they go to school. Swimming relieves the endless sorrow of losing a brother.

Your UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003 gift increase will help to cover the cost of Adam and Tal remaining at the youth village and participating in its activities. Most importantly, it will help to restore stability to the Yedid-Levi family's shattered lives.

UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003 is dedicated to Anat, Ya'acov, Tal, Adam and over 3,000 other surviving victims of terror and the social service network that makes their daily lives bearable.

Our community has already contributed over $13 million additional dollars to Israel Emergency Campaign 2003, which will be designated for:

- Assistance for victims of terror and their families
- Increased security for children in day cares, kindergartens and other facilities
- Increased medical and psychological support plus other human services for those most affected by the crisis, particularly the poor, the elderly and new immigrants

Contrasting announcements

Last Friday, the Ottawa police publicly issued a community security advisory, along with a special message to the members of Ottawa's Jewish community, from the mayor, Bob Chiarelli, and the chief of police, Vince Bevan, warning of "the possible targeting of an unspecified synagogue in Ottawa" particularly during the month of June. The advisory and the message were also distributed in shuls throughout the city that evening and the next morning as people attended Shabbat prayers.

City officials had received information from reliable sources, that they described as "troubling and unsettling," which could neither be confirmed nor denied by police and the RCMP. They were clearly anguished about making their concerns public, but decided under the circumstances to issue the advisory in an effort "to balance the need to provide the community with as much accurate information as possible, while not creating undue alarm, or worse yet, satisfying those who would prey on or create unwarranted community fear."

We commend the Ottawa officials for the way in which they handled and continue to handle the situation.

We agree that a balance must be struck to enable disclosure of relevant, reliable information in a manner that is not alarmist and does not compromise investigations or ongoing security. It appears that Ottawa officials are striving diligently to achieve that balance. Police remain in close contact with community organizations and synagogues; community leaders were able to publicly and privately confer with "constituents" and congregants; and authorities have stepped up both preventative and investigative measures.

The laudable steps taken by the Ottawa police made somewhat less intelligible the announcement earlier in the week by Ontario's minister of public safety and security, Bob Runciman, that "foreign terrorists," a sleeper cell of al-Qaeda had "closed down shop and moved out of Ontario."

The cell was monitored by Ontario security agents but could not be arrested because "they were citizens like you and me," the minister said. Surely though, the matter of citizenship is completely irrelevant, as well as possibly inconsistent with his statement that "these were foreign terrorists." The only question was whether the individuals in question were committing an offence for which they could have been apprehended. At least within the last five months, since the passage of federal anti-terrorism legislation, that question has been settled. If authorities knew with sufficient certainty that the minister could say categorically the individuals were members of a sleeper cell of al-Qaeda, then the cell should have been arrested. If the cell was not arrestable, then why bother to announce their departure? All that the minister achieved by doing so was to undermine the public's sense of security. The cell had been here presumably as part of a larger, malevolent plan, and yet it was allowed to slip away.

The contrast between the effect of this announcement with that by the Ottawa police was quite stark.

Auschwitz shopping centre: update

Two years ago, the Polish government issued an order to stop the construction by the Maja Company of a shopping centre opposite the main gate to Auschwitz. The former concentration camp site has been designated by UNESCO as a heritage site, and the adjoining lands have been designated as a quiet zone and non-development zones. But the Maja Company reapplied to the local government to build a shopping centre of reduced scope. And despite the stoppage order, construction has progressed to a very advanced stage.

At its semi-annual meeting on April 15th at Auschwitz, the International Auschwitz Council was informed by the Polish minister of the interior, Andrzej Barcikowski, that under existing laws, the local government may be forced to issue an occupancy permit and the Polish government would not be in a legal position to stop it. This means that the Maja Company will be in a position to open bookstores, restaurants, bars and other tourist-oriented shops. The museum directorship and the Auschwitz council will have control of what is being sold and what activities may take place on the premises located opposite Auschwitz's main gate.

The owner of the Maja company, Janusz Marszalek, is an outspoken anti-Semite and liar who slandered two members of the Auschwitz council in a newspaper article published in the United States. Knowing his anti-Semitic background (he was indirectly involved in the building of 240 crosses by in a gravel pit that used to adjoin the former camp), we can expect that the bookstore will be selling books on Holocaust denial and the newly revised Polish edition of The Protocol of Elders of Zion.

The International Auschwitz Council is outraged that Marszalek may be in a position to exploit visitors to Auschwitz and make uncontrolled profits on this enterprise. They unanimously passed a resolution condemning the installation, recommended that Barcikowski convey our concerns to the Polish government and asked that the government pass legislation prohibiting commercial development in the quiet zone, or purchase the site and let the museum operate the facility. Failing to act on either of these recommendations will lead to further commercial development of the adjoining areas and exploitation of the sacred areas for profit.

Dissenters part of Jewish family

Most of us agree that Naomi Klein's article in the Globe and Mail on which Mordechai Ben-Dat (CJN, May 2) commented in From the Editor's Desk represents severely "twisted writing." The rants of left wingers such as Klein are tired leftovers from the '60s. However, I will argue that the thoughts, opinions and even the actions of Jews like Klein are in a way one of the real assets Jews and Israelis have.

Now, don't get me wrong. I think that in light of all that has happened in the Middle East, these idealists are a totally misguided lot. They are unaware or ignorant of the horrific reality on the streets in Israel. But because they are part of our "extended family," we can always argue that the Palestinians don't have a corresponding element of dissent within their family. We are a mature society that knows how to tolerate dissenting views. In fact, we even welcome it, because that is what makes our cause that much stronger.

The Palestinians, and most of the rest of the world for that matter, are not so indulgent with opposing points of view within their own community.

Unfortunately, stories and pictures about how the Palestinians lynch suspected collaborators and string their bodies up in town squares, which would show how they "tolerate" dissent, are not publicized in the media. Compare these actions to how we tolerate opposing opinions, like Klein's, from within our own camp.

Should Canada pull out of the UN?

On May 7, the UN General Assembly voted to ask Secretary-General Kofi Annan to prepare a report on "Zionist atrocities" in Jenin, and condemned Israel for its unwillingness to agree to a UN fact-finding mission there. Israel's rejection was based on the proposed fact-finding commission's terms of reference, which would have focused exclusively on Israeli actions, and not on what had provoked them.

Such details didn't matter to the UN. Nor did the fact that Israel had once again become the victim of a terrorist attack a few short hours earlier, when a suicide bomber struck a pool hall in Rishon Letzion. The attack took place on the same day U.S. President George W. Bush and Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon met in Washington, attempting to kick-start negotiations that would likely lead to the establishment of a Palestinian state. It also didn't matter that a senior Palestinian official had recently acknowledged the Palestinian death toll in Jenin was less than 60.

The UN's abusiveness towards Israel, as illustrated by the plethora of anti-Israel resolutions it tables, as well as by last year's anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa, which turned into an anti-Israel crusade, couldn't be put on hold for such trivialities. Author and journalist Yossi Klein Halevi may have understated the case when he said that the UN has squandered the dream of a united humanity animated by justice to join an unholy coalition of Islamic fundamentalists, far-left moralizers and far-right neo-fascists in targeting Jews.

Isn't it time the UN started to work toward the goals its founders envisaged for such an august world body? Shouldn't the UN begin considering human rights issues in countries like Syria and Sudan, which routinely get seated on its councils and committees, only to cast votes against democracies like Israel? If steps aren't taken to reform the organization, maybe it's time Canada considered pulling out.

The Muslims' dubious claim to Jerusalem

By PAUL C. MERKLEY

The Muslims say to Britain, to France, and to all the infidel nations that Jerusalem is Arab. We shall not respect anyone else's wishes regarding her. The only relevant party is the Islamic nation, which will not allow infidel nations to interfere.

– Sheik Ikrama Sabri,
Mufti of Jerusalem,
July 11, 1997.

From time to time, it is necessary for those of us who live in giant nations like Canada to remind ourselves of how small Israel is – and, more pointedly, how small a portion of its neighbourhood, which is otherwise a Muslim Arab neighbourhood, it possesses.

A worshipper at the Western Wall looks past the Dome of the Rock in the Old City of Jerusalem.
[RNS/Reuters photo]

Today, there are 21 separate states, plus the Palestine Liberation Organization, in the Arab League, with a total population of more than 300 million – that is, about 50 times the population of Israel. The Arab states take up some 5 million square miles, which accounts for about one-tenth of the landmass of the world – even though they make up more than about 1/20th of the world's population. Arab lands amount to about 650 times the landmass occupied by Israel (8,000 square miles), which has about 1/1,000th of the world's population.

Why does this miniscule non-Arab, non-Muslim entity cause such derangement in that part of the world? And why is the issue of Israel and its relationship with its neighbours such an obsession at the United Nations?

Israel's offence follows not from any of the properties that westerners (Christian or secular) imagine they can measure (size, population, wealth); nor does it follow any of the categories of moral evaluation that westerners use to judge the rights and wrongs of other current political issues.

Israel's offence follows from the nature of Islam. It is because Israel is the only non-Muslim sovereign state in the heart of the Muslim world that Muslims cannot be at peace with it. Israel has accomplished what is theologically impossible and impermissible. It has taken a portion of the Muslim world into the anti-Islamic world.

The Qu'ran states that as punishment for the Jews' refusal to heed the prophet, "humiliation and wretchedness were stamped upon them and they were visited with wrath from Allah" (Sura II:61; cf., Sura III:112). Muslims understand this as an eternal judgement on the Jews. The creation of the State of Israel is an intolerable reversal of this judgement, an assault on the credibility of Islam that cannot be permitted to stand.

Through some 12 centuries of Muslim rule (briefly interrupted by Crusader rule), Jerusalem was a city despised by Muslims and revered by Jews. All the evidence indicates that Jews were always a majority in the city, except during brief periods when Roman Emperors or Christian kings forbade their presence on pain of death.

We have credible census reports from only about 1870 onward, but these clearly prove that there was a Jewish majority in the whole city of Jerusalem, including the Old City – that is, the walled city where all local life had been confined until the late 19th century. The fact that so few Muslim Arabs were interested in living in Jerusalem until the years of the British Mandate reflects the relative weakness of the theological motive among Muslims of the time – which contrasts strongly with present Muslim interest in this "Holy City."

At some point in recent times, Muslims began speaking of Jerusalem as Al Quds (the Holy Place) and as "the third holiest place in Islam." Yet Jerusalem appears nowhere in the Qu'ran – neither by direct name, nor by allusion. In 691 A.D., when the Ummayad dynasty, based in Damascus (660s to 750), was in possession of this region, but was not in possession of Mecca or Medina, Caliph Abdel Malek Ibn Marwan proposed that the Temple Mount had been the site of Muhammad's mystical night time journey to Al Aqsa – "the furthest mosque" (il masjad al aksa). An indentation on the rock was identified as the print left by Muhammad's horse Barak (who had a woman's head and a peacock's tail) as horse and rider ascended into the heavens.

None of this is in the Qu'ran. The whole reference there is as follows: "Glory to [God]/ Who did take His Servant [Muhammad]./ for a journey by night/ From the Sacred Mosque [at Mecca]/ To the Farthest Mosque./ Whose precincts We did/Bless, – in order that We/ Might show him some/ Of Our signs; for He/ Is the One who heareth/ And seeth [all things]" (Sura XVII:1-2).

There was, of course, no mosque on the Temple Mount in Muhammad's time, only a Byzantine church that was later to be replaced by the present Al Aqsa Mosque. In modern times, this holy association has been magnified to match political requirements: when Muslims speak to western Christians, they insist that historical associations make Jerusalem (Al Quds) equal in spiritual importance to Christians, Jews and Muslims; when speaking to Muslim audiences, Muslims state that Al Quds is pre-eminently and pre-emptively sacred to Islam. The Jews, in contrast, have never asserted any claim to possession of any site on earth but this one – the site of their ancient Temple. They have utterly no interest in asserting a claim to Mecca or Medina, or, for that matter, to Rome or Kapilavastu (the childhood home of the Buddha), et cetera.

The Israeli cabinet recently considered re-opening the Temple Mount to Jews, not only for visiting, but for prayer, a move that would have overturned a policy that has been in place since Jerusalem was reunited during the Six Day War of June 1967. The idea was ultimately rejected. Yet, one thing is certain: the decision will not affect Muslim attitudes. The notion that a "right decision" would win over or lose Muslim moderate opinion throughout the world has been disproved by history: the decision to do the right thing and to hand the Temple Mount over to Islamic control in the first place gained Israel absolutely nothing.

Walking to, from prayers. [RNS/Reuters photo]

We have seen a great many images lately of the Palestinian flag, and we are told that the great unrealized ambition of the Palestinian people is to see it flying over the Temple Mount and atop the Christian holy sites in Jerusalem. It is important to note that none of the historical elements appearing on that flag belongs to the local history of Palestine and none of them has secular significance. All belong to the history of Islam: the black represents the Prophet Muhammad; the white represents the Umayyad Dynasty; the red represents the Khawarij, an early Islamic revolutionary group; and the green represents the Fatimid Dynasty of North Africa. (I draw this information from the Yearbook of the Palestinian Academic Society for the Study of International Affairs.)

The second intifadah surely makes clear what the first intifadah perhaps did not. The conflict between Israel and its enemies is not about an unsatisfied need for political independence, but about the Islamic claim to pre-emptive possession of everything that is sacred to Jews and Christians everywhere.

The disease is spreading

The disease I have in mind is the old anti-Semitism that we hoped would no longer be part of western culture.

The Holocaust had made many of our enemies wary, but of late they have cast off their hesitation and are back to their old "hate-the-Jews" campaign.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

France leads Europe today in the percentage of people who freely admit to anti-Semitic sentiments, and wherever such feelings exist, evil deeds will follow sooner or later.

And, indeed, synagogues have already been desecrated and torched, Jewish businesses have been vandalized, and expressing anti-Semitic feelings has become perfectly acceptable once again.

As one who has lived in Germany and watched the growth of the Nazi party and its eventual rise to power, I should be greatly worried about the future. Yet, strangely, I am not. There may be tougher times ahead, and Israel will surely be vilified even more than it already has been. But this too shall pass.

Meanwhile, let us support Israel with vim and vigour, and while we are rousing ourselves, let us remind the world again and again about the contributions we have made to society. That in itself will not stem anti-Semitism, but the knowledge will help us affirm our self-esteem. They cannot overcome us when we know who we are and are determined to stand up for our people, come what may.

A piece in this vein by the late American comedian Sam Levinson has recently made the rounds on various Web sites:

"It's a free world and you don't have to like Jews, but if you don't, I suggest that you boycott certain Jewish products, like the Wasserman Test for Syphilis; digitalis, discovered by Dr. Nuslin; insulin, discovered by Dr. Minofsky; chloral hydrate, discovered by Dr. Lifreich; the Schick Test for diphtheria; vitamins, discovered by Dr. Funk; streptomycin, discovered by Dr. Woronan; the polio pill, by Dr. Sabin; the Polio Vaccine, by Dr. Jonas Salk.

"Go on boycott!

"Humanitarian consistency requires that my people offer all these gifts to all people of the world. Fanatic consistency requires that all bigots accept syphilis, diabetes, convulsions, malnutrition, polio and tuberculosis as a matter of principle.

"You want to be mad at us? Be mad at us! But I'm telling you, you ain't gonna feel so good."

Letter from Jerusalem

Here we are in Israel, and my heart is so full I find it difficult to organize my thoughts. It's the little things that give the current situation away: soldiers forbidden to hitchhike; not just a guard at the post office, but a metal detector machine and a soldier to pick through your bag after it has been scanned; closed shops in tourist areas; empty tourist offices, closing out sales, Zion Square full of armed guards.

Irony, however, still abounds.

It starts with the Knesset, infamous for its raucous debates, which sits on the "Hill of Tranquility." Across town, the United Nations headquarters is built on the "Hill of Evil Counsel."

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

We feel like ghosts in Jerusalem, haunting once-crowded attractions and finding our favourite tours non-operational. Yet life goes on, with its murky and contradictory realities. The main thing is to expect complexity, a virtue the western media (think CNN) have given up in return for the simple, and therefore false, image of Israel. But some few signs of hope for better times still flourish in the most unexpected places.

An example? Half a decade ago, two students in education from Machon Mandel approached a small yishuv on the border of Upper and Lower Galilee with an intriguing proposal – educating Jewish and Arab children in the same school. Kids would study both Hebrew and Arabic and learn all subjects together, except for religion. Teachers would come from both communities, and the school would have an Arab and a Jewish principal sharing the post.

Galil, the name chosen for the school, has been running for four years, drawing students from Jewish settlements inside pre-1967 borders and surrounding Arab villages. Contact between parents and teachers, and Jewish and Arab students, has been regular, though not without difficulties.

The participating Jewish settlements that snake along the high ridges of the Galilee were planted there by Ariel Sharon, giving Jews a commanding position over Arab villages lying further down the hillsides. Ironically, Russian immigrants who were supposed to live in the new Jewish areas preferred city life, so it was mainly idealistic young couples who came to live in the Spartan surroundings.

Each encounter between Jews and Arabs comes with a heavy past, blocked by a dismal present, shrouded in a misty future. Grand schemes for weighty negotiations between states will have their part to play.

But in the meantime, while both sides contemplate their lines in the sand, simple ideas such as the Galil school make sense.

(I should add that for many years there has been a summer camp for Jewish and Arab children in the same area. An Arab family attended the bar mitzvah we celebrated on Shabbat at Shoreshim, one of the settlements whose children attend the Galil school.)

Later in our trip, irony intrudes again. Two Arab women are arrested on suspicion of recruiting female suicide bombers. The irony?

They come from an Arab village that has just negotiated space where the Galil school will have its permanent site.

In nearby Haifa, an Arab-owned restaurant, the site of a suicide bombing that killed 16 people (Jews and Arabs), reopens the same day the women are charged, with Jewish and Arab patrons returning in droves.

In this letter that abounds with irony and ambiguity, I must add our trip home on the bus today. We pass a demonstration proclaiming "Withdraw from the territories, for the sake of Israel." Tomorrow we will have coffee with settlers determined to stay in those territories. And in tonight's news, we learn that four Jews charged with planning a terrorist attack against an Arab girls' school were arraigned in a Jerusalem court.

We have also visited with a family living in a mixed – religious and secular – neighbourhood. Their son will begin hesder in another year, then the army, a common choice for modern religious youth. Their balcony overlooks the road where roadside shootings have left several Israelis dead. Where years ago they would have supported Oslo, today they contemplate voting Likud in the next election.

What to make of all this? Unlike the western media, we find no way to quickly summarize the reality that is life in Israel today. It is thick with hope and history.

And for that future in the mist? Who can tell?

Common scents Jewish memories

As a lactose intolerant person, Shavuot isn't exactly a holiday whose menus appeal to me. Between the cheese pies, cheese blintzes and cheese kugels, I am painfully more aware of the holiday than my non-lactose intolerant co-religionists. As much as I wish that the overwhelming, warm sensation I feel at the very depth of my being on Shavuot were the divine presence... it's not.

Stuart Slayen in Winnipeg

And just over seven weeks ago, we celebrated Pesach, the most food-focused of all holidays. A friend wondered how there was no time to let the bread rise as B'nai Yisrael left Egypt, but there was time to crack a dozen eggs to make a cake, and time to catch, grind and spice 30 pounds of pike. In my family, Pesach is more Noah than Moses as we tend to consume two of every species.

With this Shavuot that just ended, I think I'm finally starting to get the connection between Jews, the Jewish calendar and food. I'm not talking about kashrut, necessarily, but about the eating habits connected to Jewish ritual and Jewish being. And the power of it all.

Since becoming a parent three years ago and again one year ago, I've become increasingly aware of food in general. As far as my children's nutrition is concerned, food is a frequent topic in our home.

"Cari, please eat all five of your cucumber slices. If you eat all five, you can have a cookie for dessert. OK, four, but no cookie. Fine, eat three and you can have half a cookie..."

By the end of the discussion, I've found that I've agreed to let my three-year-old daughter eat half a slice of cucumber, but only after she finished her five cookies. If dessert was a topic negotiated at the United Nations, my daughter would be on the Security Council.

Just before the weekend, our pediatrician informed us by voice mail that a blood test showed our one-year-old son Noah was somewhat low in iron. The solution, he said, was to feed our boy a bit more red meat than we normally do. Well, needless to say, we have since stuffed our boy with beef in complete defiance of Shavuot tradition, not to mention the Canada Food Guide. One phone call from the doctor, and the boy is on Atkins.

The point is that as our consciousness in our household about food has risen, so has the Jewish connection. Our three-year-old daughter knows that Friday night is grape juice, challah and chicken. Pesach, of course, is matzah. On Rosh Hashanah, she gleefully dips apples in honey. On Chanukah, it takes a hose and a pail to clean her up after the sufganiot. Our son is also starting to partake of Shabbat and holiday fare, although most of it ends up on the floor or in his hair. As they get older, they'll learn that the tastes and smells are tangible symbols of something more important.

What I'm finally starting to realize is that the foods we eat on certain holidays – those that are mandated and those that are just customary – carry a great deal of significance. I'm starting to believe that the scent, flavour and texture of challah will always remind our kids of Shabbat dinner at home. The "shkaydim" they put into their chicken soup at Zaida and Baba's house will also kindle Shabbat memories. The scent of Baba's meatballs and 73 types of kugel will always evoke memories of Rosh Hashanah. And Rosh Hashanah will always evoke memories of the food.

And that seems to be the key. Creating Jewish realities for our children will create Jewish memories. They can't yet intellectualize about Shabbat, or challenge their parents' level of observance or meditate. But eating challah is an activity they can understand. It touches the senses.

When they're older, perhaps it will touch the soul.

The Kirshner File

Historian of the Holocaust reviews the issues

Yehuda Bauer of the Hebrew University is doubtless one of the great Holocaust scholars of our time, having studied every facet of this seminal, unprecedented tragedy.

Now, in Rethinking the Holocaust (Yale University Press), he applies his erudition to a variety of themes he and other researchers have studied for years.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

In a series of bracing essays, he brings fresh insights to basic issues ranging from Nazi racial anti-Semitism to the connection between the Holocaust and the founding of the state of Israel.

Being a meticulous scholar, Bauer defines his terms before setting off on his intellectual journey. Genocide, he observes, is "the planned attempt to destroy a national, ethnic or racial group." The Holocaust is a "radicalization" of genocide, in which one of these groups is specifically targeted and physically annihilated down to the last person.

The diabolical Nazi scheme to murder European Jews – the Holocaust – was genocidal in conception and scope. But was it deliberately plotted or a function of fortuitous circumstances? Historians from the "intentionalist" school believe that Adolf Hitler, from his earliest days as a demagogue and pamphleteer, intended to wipe out Jews. "Functionalists," however, contend that Hitler exploited certain events – the outbreak of war and the German occupation of parts of the Soviet Union – to unleash his murderous crusade.

Subscribing to neither school, Bauer acknowledges that both approaches have, nevertheless, been useful for the purposes of historical investigation.

The majority of Nazi party members, he writes, were not quite certain about the centrality of anti-Semitism to their ideology. Quoting sociologist Peter Merkel, Bauer suggests that a high proportion of Nazis were not extreme anti-Semites. Although they sought to remove Jews from the German economy and Germany's culture and government administration, they were not necessarily thinking of resolving the "problem" in the gas chambers of Auschwitz.

Bauer argues that the Nazi party elite, consisting of diehards like Joseph Goebbels, Reinhard Heydrich, Heinrich Himmler, Julius Streicher and Alfred Rosenberg, developed the heinous idea of the Holocaust. Hitler was the "radicalizing factor," the essential decision-maker who issued the momentous order for the Final Solution.

Germans who cast their votes for the Nazis knew, of course, that they were voting for a party riddled with anti-Semitic notions. But anti-Semitism was not foremost in their minds, Bauer holds. Nor did the Nazis consider anti-Semitism their first priority. Topics like mass unemployment and the national trauma caused by the 1919 Treaty of Versailles superseded anti-Semitism.

"No one thought in terms of an Auschwitz: not the Nazis, not the general German population, and not the Jews," he notes.

Bauer accuses Germany's intellectual elites of preparing the ground for the Nazis. Without them, neither war nor the Holocaust would have ensued. "Once in power, the Nazis quickly gained the overwhelming support of the people."

Demolishing the myth that the educated classes opposed Hitler, Bauer reminds us that two of the four Einsatzgruppen – the mobile killing squads – were commanded by Germans with PhDs – Walther Stahlecker and Otto Rasch – while a third was led by an economist and lawyer, Otto Ohlendorf.

And lest we forget, some of the concentration camp commandants held university degrees, while doctors, biologists, chemists and engineers played an integral role in implementing the Holocaust.

"The same must be said about the scientists, philosophers, historians and theologians... who supplied the rationalizations for the murder machine..."

Taking exception to the view propounded by many of his colleagues, Bauer maintains that racial anti-Semitic ideology, buttressed by traditional Christian anti-Semitism, were the main incubating factors of the Holocaust.

He elaborates: "The basic motivation was purely ideological, rooted in an illusionary world of Nazi imagination, where an international Jewish conspiracy to control the world was opposed to a parallel Aryan quest. No genocide to date has been based so completely on myths, on hallucinations, on abstract, non-pragmatic ideology – which was then executed by very rational, pragmatic means."

Contending that the Holocaust was unique in its global reach, Bauer says it was never limited geographically. The persecution of Jews started in Germany and then, like a cancer, spread to the rest of Europe. The Holocaust, too, was unique in its intended totality. "The Nazis were looking for Jews, for all Jews."

Bauer is ambivalent about Daniel Goldhagen's Hitler's Willing Executioners, which caused an international furor in the mid-1990s. He agrees with the emphasis Goldhagen places on anti-Semitic ideology. But Bauer faults him for ignoring the social and economic ills that afflicted German society after World War I.

Furthermore, Bauer takes him to task for confusing exterminationist anti-Semitism with the kind of anti-Semitism that promoted the disappearance of Jews through assimilation and conversion. Besides, he says in a claim that should be subjected to scrutiny, most German anti-Semites "did not wish to abolish formal Jewish emancipation."

The real question to be answered, he observes, is why, after 1941, the vast majority of Germans became " a reservoir of willing murderers of Jews?"

Bauer comes down harshly on the Judenrat, the Jewish councils whose assistance, albeit coerced, was of invaluable help to the Nazis. Relying, in part, on historian Raul Hilberg's judgment, he concludes that the Judenrat's policy – a mixture of evasion, bribery and workshops and factories working on the Nazis' behalf – was a resounding failure.

Bauer debunks the theory, popular in the immediate aftermath of the war, that there was not much of a Jewish resistance movement.

Throughout Eastern Europe, from the forests of Poland to the Ukraine, upwards of 30,000 Jews fought the Germans, but with inadequate weapons. Nearly all the partisans were killed in action.

Armed rebellions broke out in a succession of ghettos, from Warsaw and Cracow to Bedzin and Czestochowa. But, as Bauer points out, the Jewish population at large did not side with the rebels. In passing, he also takes note of the rebellions that erupted in Sobibor and Treblinka.

Debate has raged as to whether the Yishuv – the Jews in Palestine – was sufficiently active in assisting beleaguered Jewish communities in Nazi-occupied Europe.

Bauer stakes out a clear position. New scholarship, he notes, shows that the Jewish Agency, led by David Ben-Gurion, was very much engaged in rescue attempts. Practically all these failed. Nonetheless, slightly more than 50,000 Jews managed to reach Palestine, mostly from Hungary, the Balkans and the Soviet Union.

Could the Allies have helped? Prior to November 1943, they could not bomb the death camps in Poland, since they lacked airfields close enough. But after that date they could have acted with resolve. That they did not speaks volumes.

Finkelstein screed

Norman Finkelstein's latest screed, The Holocaust Industry (Verso), argues that Israel and the organized American Jewish community exploit the Holocaust to justify Israel's "criminal policies" and to gain U.S. support for them.

Finkelstein, who teaches political science at DePaul University in Chicago, previously focused his attention on the Arab-Israeli conflict, producing three slanted books on the subject. Now, in The Holocaust Industry, Finkelstein – the son of Warsaw ghetto survivors – uses the Holocaust to bitterly denounce Israel.

Like any other country, Israel should not be immune from criticism. Its policies, particularly with respect to the Palestinians, are not always wise and far-sighted. But in this thin volume, Finkelstein veers way beyond the boundaries of fair comment.

He argues that the Six Day War revived memories of Jewish vulnerability and prompted the United States to form a strategic alliance with Israel. True. But then he goes off on a tangent, claiming that Israel, in league with American Jewish leaders, exploited the Holocaust for their own cynical ends.

Finkelstein makes several other points that do not hold up under scrutiny. "The claims of Holocaust uniqueness are intellectually barren and morally discredible," he writes in an unsubstantiated blast. Finkelstein also claims that many Jewish survivors "fabricated" their past so as to collect reparation payments from Germany. This verges on the libellous. Then he segues into a rant comparing the "Holocaust industry" to "an outright extortion racket."

Finkelstein is entitled to his opinions. But his views, besides being reprehensible and baseless, are gleefully lapped up by Holocaust deniers.

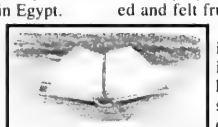
Sometimes we just want to complain

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS

At the end of this week's parshah (Numbers 11:4), the Torah describes how a group of the Jewish people came complaining to Moses. They wanted meat like they had back in Egypt.



Rabbinic Reflections

"Remember the good life back in Egypt with the cucumbers and melons that we ate for free?" they asked. "Well, we want the good life, we want meat."

The Jewish people complain a lot in the Torah. Sometimes Moses responds calmly, sometimes angrily. Sometimes he responds by calling to HaShem. Some of these complaints are well founded and reasonable – for example, when the people complain that they want water and ask for food while wandering in the desert. When the people complain to Moses after he goes to Pharoah the first time, and, instead of letting the Jewish people go, he makes their work even harder – that, too, is an understandable complaint.

However, in this complaint about the meat, Moshe did not fall on his face in prayer – he became exasperated and felt frustrated.

Rav Yaakov Kaminetsky points out an interesting aspect of human nature in this story. The people in the desert were fed manna from heaven every day. The Torah describes the look of the manna and says that there was sufficient for each person every day. What did the manna taste like? The Midrash comments that the manna could taste like whatever you wanted it to. If you wanted it to taste like cheese, it would taste like cheese. If you wanted it to taste like bread, it would taste like bread. If you wanted it to taste like meat, it would taste like meat.

So if it could taste like meat, why were they complaining that they wanted meat? The point of this Midrash is to comment on human nature. We could make it taste like meat, but we would rather complain. When you have everything you need, you complain. When you don't have everything you need, you complain. Some people just like to complain – whether for a good reason or not.

This was what Moses found frustrating: "I can respond to complaints that are reasonable. I can help people who want help. But when the complaints are not real and are simply complaints, that is harder to respond to."

We must always be careful to express our dissatisfaction in a reasonable way, to know when to complain, to know what to complain about, to know how to complain – and to recognize in ourselves when we are merely entertaining ourselves by kvetching.

Thank you, parliamentarians

Guest Voice

By NORM GODFREY

The two-day visit of 27 Canadian federal legislators, members of Parliament and senators to Israel on a Canada-Israel-Committee-sponsored trip in late April is deserving of our community's acknowledgement and thanks.

At a time when many Canadian Jews have been wondering about our country's Mideast policies, and at a time when Israel itself is feeling isolated, the largest delegation of parliamentarians to ever travel from Canada chose to travel to Israel.

I was privileged to have the opportunity of joining this group on their brief visit.

The partisan divides that are so apparent here in Canada disappeared as the group engaged in constant meetings and briefings that reflected the diversity of opinion in Israel. They had the opportunity to meet not only with Israelis, but also with Palestinian representatives.

I sat and watched as they took notes, asked questions, challenged speakers and made notes of items they wanted to pursue further.

As Foreign Minister Shimon Peres walked into the Ministry of Foreign Affairs briefing room, I could see that he was taken aback by the size of the delegation. He noted that the presence of so many Canadian parliamentarians was a message of friendship. He paid tribute to Canada's recent role at the United Nations Human Rights Commission meetings in Geneva and thanked each parliamentarian for travelling to Israel at a time when so few are visiting. What was to be a brief 30-minute meeting went an hour longer than scheduled.

Most of the people the parliamentarians met with commented on the size of the delegation. The presence of so many in Israel on one trip was seen as a statement.

While our parliamentarians learned first-hand about the challenges, realities and issues facing Israelis, I had the chance to learn more about our parliamentarians.

What was significant about this group was that most do not have many Jewish constituents. Indeed, some likely do not have any.

As a Canadian, I was proud to be in their company. They spent a total of 24 hours on airplanes to be in Israel for just two days and took every moment of their time there seriously. These individuals, representing four of the five parties in the House of Commons (there were no Conservative MPs or senators), did not go out of political considerations. They went out of an interest and responsibility to educate themselves.

I had a clear impression that as a result of their time in Israel, their understanding of the country expanded, their concern for the challenges facing Israelis deepened, and they valued our community more for having provided them with this opportunity.

The respect and access accorded this Canadian delegation spoke clearly to the importance that Israel places on its relationship with Canada. Now that they have returned, the challenge falls to us to show these legislators the respect and importance that we place in our relationship with each of them. As capable as we are of corresponding when we are upset, we must now demonstrate the same ability to say thank you – thank you for going, thank you for engaging in the issues.

As a Jew, I was proud that Israel let this group of parliamentarians know how important their visit was. As a citizen of Canada, I was proud to be represented by them.

A list of contact information for the parliamentarians who travelled to Israel can be found at: cicweb.ca.

Israeli victims of terror

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Statistics about Israeli victims of terror are reported with tragic regularity. But there are other elements we don't hear nearly as much about: details about the remarkable lives that have been cut short, how families are trying to cope with their grief and what their communities are doing to help. Today, the stories behind the statistics and background about the Israeli organizations that help victims of terror.

Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs chronicles the lives and deaths of all the victims of terrorism since September 2000 [http://www.mfa.gov.il/mfa/go.asp?MFAH0iky0]. As of this writing, the list has 493 names. One of those names is Rina Didovsky.

On Dec. 8, 2000, Didovsky, 39, was a passenger in a van en route to Kiryat Arba when a car full of gunmen sprayed the van with bullets. The mother of six died in the attack. According to the ministry Web site, "Didovsky's husband, Haim, runs a settler news agency called Hakol Mehashetach (voice from the field) and he was the first to inform journalists of the incident. Only later did he discover he had reported the death of his wife. Friday afternoon, thousands lined the Jerusalem streets through which Didovsky's funeral procession passed. She was buried in Jerusalem's Har Hamenuhot cemetery" [http://www.mfa.gov.il/mfa/go.asp?MFAH0ikv0].

On June 1 of last year, 21 people were killed near the Tel Aviv Dolphinarium. The DolfinDisko Web site has photos and biographies of the victims, most of them teenage immigrants from Russia, along with a poem in their memory [http://www.dolfindisko.com].

The Terror Victims Association plays a critical role. According to its Web site, "Unlike the military, where families of injured or killed soldiers are visited on a regular basis by the unit's social workers to keep a connection between the unit and the families, there is no real framework set up by the government to deal with the families of terror victims." A network of volunteers, including social workers, helps families of the victims cope with their tragedies. The association also lobbies the Israeli government and has launched legal battles against the perpetrators of terror [http://www.terrorvictims.com/]. Similarly, an American organization called Stop Terror has launched several cases on behalf of U.S. citizens who were killed or injured while in Israel. You can read court documents from three of their cases on their Web site [http://www.stopterror.org/lawsuits.html].

Natal, the Israel Trauma Center for Victims of Terror and War, is a non-profit organization that provides trauma therapy and counselling. The centre explains that victims of terror have different needs from victims of road accidents, domestic violence or rape. Natal works with anyone suffering from emotional stress as a result of the Israeli-Arab conflict [http://www.natal.org.il/eng/site_map.html]. If you have the Hebrew font installed on your computer, visit Natal's discussion forum which contains hundreds of entries where victims of terror talk candidly about their pain, loss, futility and anger. After you spend a bit of time at this Web site, you begin to feel the sense of community and support the organization fosters [http://forums.nana.co.il/forum.asp?id=1988].

Bituach Leumi, the National Insurance Institute of Israel, has just created a site that lists civilian victims of terror dating back to the establishment of the State of Israel. This Hebrew-only Web site allows you to search its database by decade, location of attack and hometown of victim [http://www.galed.co.il/leumi/search.asp]. Friends and relatives are invited to submit reminiscences and other biographical information to be added to the historical record [http://www.galed.co.il/leumi/connect.html]. Also on the site is a photograph of the memorial to civilian victims of terror at Mount Herzl cemetery in Jerusalem.

The town of Efrat has lost three of its residents to terror. Efrat's Rabbi Shlomo Riskin writes that survivors have a responsibility to those who have died. "We must live our lives for the sake of ideals that are beyond those of each individual – like the nation of Israel, the Torah of Israel, and the land of Israel – in order to give meaning to our lives and to bear witness that Esther, Baruch and Sarah did not die in vain since they did not live in vain" [http://www.vulcana.com/memorial/english.html].

Another valuable collection

Books
Bernard Baskin

Never Far Away: the Auschwitz Chronicles of Anna Heilman*, University of Calgary Press, $24.95.

Will they never come to an end? I mean the books about the Nazi terror and oppression. Aren't we surfeited? Haven't we been told over and over again – often in shocking and horrifying detail – that the Holocaust was the triumph of death over life, ugliness over beauty, hate over love, evil over goodness?

Perhaps books continue to be written to affirm those values that even the most diabolical cruelty could not expunge, to indicate what it meant to remain human despite all the forces that strove to coerce despairing victims into grotesque forms and shapes of inhumaneness.

Anna Heilman, now living in Ontario with her family, was born into the comfort and security of a largely assimilated family in prewar Poland. Her life as a child was happy and carefree. Looking back on those years, a half-century or so ago, before her family was engulfed by the horror of the Holocaust, she remembers the delights of home and friends and school.

Soon after war broke out in September 1939, her father came home one day a changed man. His hair had turned all white. "His face was composed but his eyes were tortured, full of tears that he had to wipe away with his handkerchief. In his hand he had a piece of paper, a receipt from our factory. The Germans had confiscated his factory. On that day, the nightmare began."

The author and her sister, whom she loved dearly, were eventually sent to Auschwitz, where they escaped certain death by being chosen to work as slave labourers in the camp's munitions factory. Furtively, the two sisters, together with a small number of other women, began to smuggle small amounts of gunpowder from the factory to the men of the Sonderkommando.

"One day in October 1944, there was an awful commotion. The Sonderkommando revolted. They succeeded in blowing up one of the crematoria before the SS killed all of them on the spot. We were at work in the factory when the revolt occurred. We were dumbfounded. There had been no planned date for the uprising. No password had been given. What had happened?

"Slowly, bits and pieces of information reached us. It seemed that there had been an informer among the Sonderkommando who got wind of the preparations for the uprising and betrayed them to the SS."

After the failed uprising, Anna's sister and three other young women were publicly executed before the whole camp. These women were murdered, as were millions of others, but their acts of defiance and courage forced the Nazis to recognize them as resistance fighters.

The executions took place shortly before the camp was evacuated, just ahead of the advancing Red Army. Anna Heilman possessed the amazing strength, courage and will to complete the death march to Neustadt-Glewe. On May 2, 1945, she successfully traversed the valley of death when the prisoners were liberated by the Russians.

Heilman's diaries are not simply a serious documentation of life in Auschwitz, or an exploration of the human heart, or a struggle to deal with large moral questions. They are an attempt to free herself from the ghost of murdered inmates, especially her sister, and from "the experience of radical evil."

These many-sided recollections are filled with courage, nostalgia, remorse and the spirit of renewal. They provide another valuable addition to the intricate mosaic of the Holocaust experience.

Bonds honours Marvelle Koffler for her leadership

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Marvelle Koffler was recently honoured with State of Israel Bonds' 2002 Golda Meir Leadership Award.

The award is presented by Bonds to individuals who have distinguished themselves in their chosen field and in their support of Israel.

Last year's recipient was journalist and author Barbara Amiel Black.

Koffler, who received the Order of Ontario in 1999, is founder of the International Committee of Women for Science of the Weizmann Institute, and the co-founder, with her husband Murray, of the Koffler Centre of the Arts.

She has participated on a number of boards, including those of the Tel Aviv Museum, the Weizmann Institute of Science, the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation and Mount Sinai Hospital's board of governors. She has also been active with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra and the Canadian Opera Company.

Marvelle Koffler

After she was diagnosed with breast cancer in 1991, Koffler founded the Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre, a comprehensive care centre located at Mount Sinai Hospital.

In an interview with The CJN, Koffler, who has five children and 16 grandchildren, credited her parents, Eva and Irving Seligman, with giving her a sense of community.

"We were always encouraged to take part in tag days. That is when my commitment to the community began.

"It's important to me to help out and get going. I try to take part quietly in the Jewish community and [the community at large]."

It is up to community volunteers to lead by example, she said, so that "their children, by osmosis, will have the desire to follow."

It is also important to her, she says, to support Israel by visiting as often as possible. "Israel has always given the Jewish people their backbone and has allowed them to stand tall [as Jews.] We have to be supportive emotionally, physically and financially."

She was last in Israel in November, she said, and she saw that Israelis' spirits were high. "They are not in a state of despair. Although they remain very cautious, their lives are continuing.

"Families are living fairly normal lives because parents do not want to instill fear in their children. Kids play on their bikes, gather with their friends and go to school on buses. One of the only times parents may say 'no' is if their children want to go to a party in a public place."

At the Golda Meir Luncheon, Amiel Black, who was unable to attend, sent a message that said, "For me, [Marvelle] is a beacon of light. No matter how dark or ugly the times surrounding us, the Jewish tradition is to create warmth and ever more light. No one could exemplify that more than Marvelle...

"One is hard put to know how many hundreds of thousands of people have had some corner of their lives illuminated by Marvelle's work in Israel and Canada: the sciences, the arts and medicine have all felt her magic," said Amiel Black.

Renette Berman, chair of Bonds' women division, said Koffler is an "inspirational leader and is dedicated to Israel. She has helped us focus on the positive and the beautiful in Israel. That is what this award embodies."

Dana Black knows that good health is a gift.

At age 51, the active wife and mother of two was diagnosed with Rheumatoid Arthritis.

She left the job she loved because of her condition — and as a result lost a big part of her identity and self-esteem. To make matters worse, all of the recreational activities she enjoyed were now painfully difficult.

Dana was facing a life-long struggle with an illness that causes painful inflammation of the joints. She found herself retreating from the world and sliding into a deep depression.

Where was the light at the end of the tunnel?

Joining Baycrest's Set Your PACE Program helped Dana take back control of her life and rediscover her pride and confidence. She learned it's not about what she can no longer do, but what she can do. And there's lots to do!

She's learned to manage her arthritis, pace herself and find new interests.

Dana now volunteers with the Pace Program and is an inspiration to others living with chronic illness.

"It goes both ways. As much as I help others, they help me too."

Dana keeps fit with acquatic excercise at the Baycrest Centre pool. With her (at left) is physiotherapist Jennifer Sansalone.

School to be monitored after anti-Israel drawings found

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

The Toronto District School Board will be monitoring an Arabic language school that rents classrooms from a Scarborough high school after anti-Israel drawings were displayed there.

TDSB media relations spokesperson Jennifer McIntyre said an Arabic language and heritage group has been renting space in Sir Winston Churchill Collegiate Institute for the past four years and meets regularly on Saturdays and during the summer.

According to the group, a one-day activity that included colouring in the pre-printed, connect-the-dot drawings was recommended by a psychologist to the Arabic language school to help its students deal with the current crisis in the Middle East, McIntyre said.

The Arabic language school claimed the pictures, which depicted Israeli airplanes dropping bombs on buildings, were a one-time occurrence and has apologized for the incident.

McIntyre would not reveal the name of the school or principal, citing privacy concerns, but a source later told The CJN the school is run by the Al-Huda Lebanese Muslim Society.

However, she did say that all groups applying for a TDSB permit must describe the purpose of their request. A permit can be denied if the group is known to promote violence or any other action that is considered inappropriate.

It is not TDSB policy to review or pre-approve curriculum, McIntyre said.

The board would only become involved if something came to its attention and would then decide whether to monitor the situation or cancel the permit.

While McIntyre said the drawings are inconsistent with the TDSB's policies on diversity, she did not feel there was a need to cancel the permit.

At this time, the board has decided to monitor the situation, she said.

Frank Bialystok, chair of the community relations committee of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, said that while these are positive steps, CJC is concerned that the permit holders will, on the strength of their apology, be permitted to conduct their business with no oversight mechanisms in place.

Bialystok added that "it is neither reasonable nor in the public interest for the permit holders to operate with the same freedom that they were given prior to this offence."

CREATIVE QUILT: Associated Hebrew Schools Grade 3 students at the Posluns campus in Toronto created a quilt for their unit on animals. Each child cut and sewed one square, and the finished result was sewn together to make a wall hanging. Shown, from left are: Esther Abecassis, Aimee Genah, Dustin Kopman and Elliot Wine.

RAMBAM NEEDS YOU NOW!

Rambam Medical Center in Haifa, Israel is the largest full service hospital in Northern Israel. It serves both civilian and military patient populations. Rambam is on the front lines of the military crisis in Israel and currently is treating, in addition to its regular patient load, at least 8 wounded soldiers and 8 civilian victims of suicide bomber terrorists. Rambam is responsible for helping victims of rocket attacks against civilian settlements and wounded soldiers defending Israel's northern border.

Rambam urgently needs our financial assistance to provide its services, particularly in the Pediatric Intensive Care Unit, and generally to provide care for the victims of terror.

Amal Schools seek to raise their profile in Canada

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Canadian Friends of Amal dates back to the 1920s, but the Israeli network of schools is not a household name here.

Itzchak Fuchs, the 53-year-old Tel Aviv-based director general of Amal Network of Colleges and High Schools for Technologies, Sciences and Arts, was in Toronto, Montreal and Winnipeg last month to raise Amal's profile. Vancouverites may remember him as the Jewish National Fund emissary to their city from 1995 to 1998.

One of the missions of Canadian Friends of Amal is to find families to "adopt" individual Amal schools and assist them on an ongoing basis, said Michael Meyer, the group's national executive director.

Amal serves about 60,000 students a year in 110 institutions. Many Israeli soldiers working in technical areas such as aircraft mechanics received their training from Amal.

Founded in 1928 by the Histadrut-General Federation of Labor of Israel to prepare youngsters for jobs such as technicians and carpenters, the school system has changed direction since that time, Fuchs said.

"We still have schools that prepare children for the army, but 32 of our 55 high schools are comprehensive schools."

Amal operates within Israel's Green Line, and – for the most part – outside of major cities. Many are in "places you wouldn't believe anyone would want a school," often in out-of-the-way, low-income areas.

One exception is Amal's Lady Davis High School in Tel Aviv, adjacent to the organization's headquarters. The school was recently named one of the best six high schools in Israel. Formerly a technical school, it was upgraded to a comprehensive high school and improved to reflect local economic improvements and the changing needs of area residents, said Meyer.

In addition to the regular technical and comprehensive high schools, there is also a technical high school in Kfar Saba that serves 70 deaf students integrated with their hearing counterparts, and there are seven Amal high schools in Bedouin cities, with Israeli and Bedouin teachers working together. "They used to be in tents. Now they are regular schools, good schools," Fuchs said.

Amal also has about two dozen post-secondary vocational schools, as well as a distance education program.

None of the affiliates have been affected by the intifadah, to the best of Fuchs' knowledge. The retired major-general, who was appointed in September, visits four schools a week.

His recent career change was not as big a jump as it might seem, he said. Before retiring from the Israel Defence Forces (IDF), he dealt with the education of soldiers – often immigrants – whose spoken or written Hebrew needed upgrading. It's vital, he explained, that soldiers' language skills are good enough so they can understand their commanders.

Amal, like other Israeli schools, is funded by the Ministry of Labour and Ministry of Education and, like other schools, has been hit by government funding cuts. Ninety per cent of Amal's funding is used to pay teachers' salaries, which are mandated by the government, Fuchs said.

In some cases, however, partnerships with local municipalities or with the IDF generate extra funding for items like computers.

Because Amal serves a large proportion of underprivileged children, its schools offer hot meals, after-school tutoring and the use of computers that students might not have access to at home. "We are the last chance for some kids."

One of Fuchs' goals is finding and bringing into the Amal system more of the thousands of Israeli school-age children who are not in school.

"This is a moral mission. From any perspective it's a good thing to do. Of course we'll benefit from it, but the wider picture is that it's important not to leave anybody in the streets."

HELPING OUT THE IDF: Associated Hebrew Schools Middle School students packed dozens of boxes filled with personal care items for soldiers in the Israel Defense Forces. Shampoo, deodorant, toothpaste and other such items were placed in plastic bags along with hand-written notes from the students. The boxes will accompany Canada-Israel committee groups leaving for Israel in the coming weeks. Seen from left to right are: Carina Bouganim, Michael Sheps, Melanie Ross, Jordan Novack and Ben Laufer.

Mussar tradition teaches inner qualities: author

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

After years of studying Hinduism and Buddhism, Alan Morinis turned to Mussar, a little-known movement in Judaism, for comfort during a mid-life crisis.

Morinis, author of Climbing Jacob's Ladder: One Man's Journey to Rediscover a Jewish Spiritual Tradition, had studied Hindu pilgrimage for his doctoral dissertation at Oxford University, which he attended on a Rhodes Scholarship.

He "became lost," after a film production company that he ran for 15 years collapsed, he said in a telephone interview from New York where he was promoting his book.

"I had lost sight of my priorities, of right and wrong. I lost my ethical compassion and did things I should not have done. I was distressed at what I saw in myself, of what I had become little by little."

Morinis, who now lives in Vancouver with his wife and two daughters, grew up in Toronto in a secular Jewish family, he said.

"My perfunctory bar mitzvah was an alienating experience, and at our wedding, the rabbi did not perform the service we had written and had worked out with him.

"I began moving away from Judaism and became interested in eastern religions."

For his doctoral dissertation, he said, he spent months travelling to holy places in India.

"I never took a Hindu name or shaved my head, however. I tasted Hinduism, but never fully became part of it. Something stopped me. I knew I was Jewish, and no matter how much I learned about Hinduism, I couldn't completely go there."

His successful film production company – he won a Toronto film festival award for the Outside Chance of Maximilian Glick – collapsed in 1997, said Morinis, "and I knew I needed to rebuild the inner core of my life."

"I went off on a search; Hinduism and Buddhism did not seem authentic enough for me, so I turned to Judaism."

It was while studying Jewish texts that he came upon the 1,000-year-old Mussar tradition.

"It was developed in the 10th century, and books were written about it until the 20th century, yet people were largely unaware of it," he said.

Mussar is a personal discipline that people use to develop inner qualities that need to be worked on, said Morinis. "They could, for instance, be too quick to anger or not be generous enough. They may be too impatient or too passive. These are qualities that keep a person from being an optimal human being."

The Mussar tradition, although not meant to be about self-help, he said, gives reasons why these characteristics exist, and provides deterrents for them.

"The Torah tells us to strive for high ideals and have the inner qualities that could be considered holy, but we look at ourselves and we ask 'How do I get there?' The truth may be that I'm not naturally very generous.

"Each person has places where it is a challenge to rise up and move in the direction of the Torah. Everyone has a piece of themselves that they just can't work out. We tend to repeat patterns that cause us and others grief. These patterns are not uplifting.

"The rabbis recognize this," he said, "and they worked out a body of teaching that shows people how to transform certain qualities of their inner life. This is what I needed for myself."

Morinis spent two years reading about the Mussar tradition until he began searching for a teacher. "Many Mussar teachers had died during the war. The movement was devastated by the Holocaust."

He finally contacted Rabbi Yechiel Perr, rosh yeshiva of the Yeshiva of Far Rockaway in Long Island, N.Y. "He agreed to see me, and when I travelled there, we spent six hours together. Although he was head of a yeshiva of 250 students, he had time to spend with a lost soul. To this day, I consult him."

Each chapter of his book is about a conversation with Rabbi Perr on different topics of Mussar, he said. "Nothing in the book is my creation; I relate what I learned. Mussar is a treasure room full of a tradition that has not been accessible.

"It is a tradition that faded because of the Holocaust. Part of our spiritual life requires us to take care of others, but after the Holocaust a whole new world needed to be created. People could not get to the Mussar agenda," he said.

KURTZ RETIRES: York University's centre for Jewish studies recently held a special evening in honour of Dr. Shoshana Kurtz on the occasion of her retirement after more than 20 years of service in York's Jewish Teacher Education Program. Kurtz (seventh from the right in the front row) is surrounded by some of the approximately 100 alumni who have graduated from the York program since its launch. Today, Kurtz's former students are teaching in Jewish day schools across North America. Some have taught young people who have, in turn, graduated from the York program. Kurtz's career in Jewish education spans more than 50 years during which she was a Hebrew teacher at Eitz Chaim Schools, assistant director of the Board of Jewish Education and an adjunct professor and course director in the York University program.

The story of our Torah

By HARRIET EISENKRAFT
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

Our Torah's journey began somewhere in Poland about 100 years ago.

In a rural shtetl or in one of the major cities, a sofer did the painstaking work of writing its script. Our Torah may have then gone on to a local shul, but it is more likely that it landed, like countless others, in the arms of one of the many community members travelling to the new world, to the United States.

Perhaps that traveller was rescuing it from destruction and intended to keep it safe until a new home could be found. Perhaps the traveller was simply the courier who had been asked by the members of an already-existing congregation to bring it to them. We don't know where our Torah found its welcome once it reached the shores of America at the turn of the century.

What we do know is that some time in the 1940s it took a journey once again, this time to a military base in a suburb near Chicago. It stayed there until almost four months ago, when it arrived in Toronto in the arms of another traveller who brought it to our congregation, Toronto's Shir Libeynu (Hebrew for Song of our Hearts).

Actually, the traveller was coming home after visiting relatives in Manhattan, where the Torah rested between journeys in the offices of the Jewish Welfare Board (JWB). The JWB has been in existence since 1917 as the only agency in the United States organizing Jewish programs, education and chaplains for American military centres.

Responding to the call from bases for Torahs during the war years, it gathered hundreds of scrolls and distributed them throughout the world. It had two sources: the many synagogues around the country that were shifting or closing down; and, mainly, congregations whose members felt it was their patriotic duty to donate.

It was always understood that the Torahs belonged to the JWB because "the armed forces didn't want to deal with something so holy," remembers Rabbi David Lapp of the JWB.

Our Torah, with its original writing intact but now in a new blue velvet cover, stayed in a non-denominational chapel at Fort Sheridan, Ill., for about 50 years, says Rabbi Lapp. It served the community there until the Jewish chaplain departed when the base scaled back operations. The JWB took it and others back to its headquarters in Manhattan and offered them for sale.

As it turns out, Shir Libeynu was looking for a Torah. Our liberal, egalitarian congregation had been using two other Torahs over the seven years of its existence. One was on loan from a larger congregation for our popular High Holy Day services, held at the Cecil Street Community Centre downtown. The other, which we used only a few times, belongs to one of our members, whose grandfather brought it over from Romania.

This second Torah had been stored in a fur vault on the Prairies after a tour of duty in various rural communities (but that's another story). Its binding, however, was torn and needed expensive repairs if we were to continue to use it. We decided that we needed another one.

After our lay spiritual leader, Aviva Goldberg, heard about the JWB's cache, our enthusiastic board endorsed the purchase of our new Torah. The JWB would, in turn, use the money we spent on the Torah for its programs for the needy.

In what can only be described as a bashert series of events, last January, one of our members was about to visit his parents and adult daughter in New York. He agreed to bring the Torah back with him. After carrying it in its massive cardboard box through the streets of Manhattan, onto the train to Long Island and into the baggage section of an airplane out of LaGuardia, he eventually emerged with it at the customs section of Toronto's Pearson International Airport.

The question then arose: how to explain this holy relic to a government official who would determine whether it could enter the country and how much it would cost to do so? Added security measures since Sept. 11 only heightened the concerns. The person at the first desk referred him to a supervisor.

"This is a Torah," explained the traveller. "It's a religious item, written 100 years ago to be used... "

"I know what a Torah is," interrupted the bemused, Jewish, customs official, who then consulted his supervisor by phone, who also happened to be Jewish. What a coincidence in a world of so few Jews! Our Torah entered the country legally and as smoothly and as economically as possible.

On June 9, at 3 p.m., Shir Libeynu will celebrate the dedication of our very own Torah in a service and procession through the community garden of the Scadding Court Community Centre in downtown Toronto. All are welcome.

Although our congregation does not yet have a building, we do have a Torah and a group of people who are dedicated to a meaningful, inclusive Jewish life. Shir Libeynu is affiliated with the Network of Jewish Renewal Communities (NJRC). It provides communal activities throughout the year in which traditional families, singles, gays, lesbians, same-sex and interfaith couples and members of the deaf community may participate and feel at home.

"We at Shir Libeynu are overjoyed that this well-used, wonderful Torah has come into our lives and that we will be able to continue its active use for our services. It has a permanent place within the hearts of our community," Goldberg says.

Each year, we recognize and salute the committed corps of women and men who have made volunteering a priority in their lives. Their exceptional devotion to our community enriches us and reminds us that we can all make a difference.

These individuals and the organizations they embrace are the backbone of our compassionate community. They strengthen us and the people of Israel, especially in times of adversity like these, when unity is the key to survival.

This year we are especially proud of our volunteers for responding to Israel's emergency call for assistance. Over the last several months our community has come together, as never before, through fundraising, rallies and educational initiatives that demonstrate our indestructible bond with Israel during these difficult times.

The unity of purpose and dedication of our volunteers has enabled our community to become a world leader in responding to the current crisis facing Israel. Of this we can all be proud.

On behalf of UJA Federation, we express our deep appreciation for your remarkable commitment.

After only two months, UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003 has already raised more than $36 million, which represents gift increases and new gifts approaching $14 million, which will be going directly to Israel to:

- Assist victims of terror and their families
- Provide increased security for day care centres, kindergartens and other facilities for children
- Offer medical and psychological support for Israel's vulnerable, most affected by the current emergency

Our fundraising has been accompanied by other dramatic initiatives on Israel's behalf, organized by the Israel Now Consortium of 115 organizations, under the auspices of UJA Federation and the Consulate General of Israel.

We are proud to be a part of such a strong, caring community and we salute the men and women honoured in this Supplement with whom we are so privileged to serve.

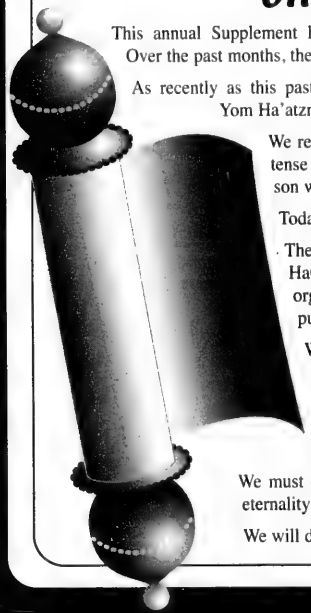
One community - inseparably linked

This annual Supplement honours thousands of individuals who volunteer to provide for the needs of the Toronto Jewish community. Over the past months, the community has come together as one united body on behalf of communal concerns.

As recently as this past month, we have witnessed a nexus of events: major rallies for Israel in Washington and Ottawa, the largest Yom Ha'atzmaut and Walk with Israel programs in Toronto's history, and the holy day of Shavuot.



We read in Shemot (19:2) that, upon receiving the Torah at Sinai, Israel "camped there." The language using the singular tense is unusual. The commentator Rashi explains that, at that moment, Israel was "k'ish echad b'lev echad— as one person with one heart."

Today, as we rally for Israel, we too come together to stand as one integral body.

The term "Clal Yisrael" is generally referred to as the gathering of all the individual parts of the whole. Harav Tzvi Yehuda HaCohen Kook maintains that it is much more: It is the eternal soul and embodiment of the nation of Israel. "Just as an organ of the body exists for its task in the body as a whole," Rav Kook explains, "so too does an individual derive his purpose from the Clal as a whole."

We are inseparably linked in one continuous chain of history and responsibility for one another.

We must redouble our advocacy efforts by writing to our politicians and media outlets. We must express our solidarity with and assist in the support of our Israeli brothers and sisters by increasing our campaign pledges, purchasing Israeli products, and visiting Israel.

We must do this and much more. It is for our beloved Israel. It is for the eternality of the Jewish People.

We will do it as one person with one heart.

IsraelNOW

Israel Now Consortium:
Bringing Toronto Jewry Together

(left to right) Rabbi John Moscowitz, Rabbi Moshe Shulman, Julia Koschitzky and Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kuhl formed the inaugural steering committee of the Israel Now Consortium.

The one word that describes the Israel Now Consortium is solidarity.

With a membership of 115 community organizations and counting, the Consortium, under the auspices of UJA Federation and the Consulate General of Israel, offers one of North America's most unified voices for Israel. Consortium members represent the entire religious and ideological spectrum of community.

The Israel Now Consortium, chaired by Julia Koschitzky, ardently and passionately shows the citizens of Israel they will never stand alone. Consortium-run rallies in Toronto attracted more than 20,000 participants. The Consortium also helped 10,000 Torontonians attend Israel rallies in Ottawa and Washington by bus and plane and organized Toronto's largest-ever Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration. In addition, the Consortium sponsored several expert speakers on the Middle East and served as an effective vehicle to keep the community up to date on individual organization activities.

The Consortium's success is based, in large measure, on adherence to its mission statement.

- Strengthening the bonds of solidarity with our brothers and sisters in Israel.
- Developing core, cross-organizational programs, including rallies, grassroots advocacy activities and missions to Israel.
- Promotion and coordination of a broad range of Israel advocacy programs that will engage all elements of the community.

"The consortium is a reflection of Toronto's remarkable Jewish community and its unbreakable bond with Israel," says Koschitzky. "Few communities in the world have united to such an extraordinary extent on behalf of Israel and the impact can only be positive and powerful."

Community Awards

The women and men pictured here have made tzedakah and community involvement constant priorities in their lives. They will receive their Volunteer Recognition Awards on behalf of the entire community at UJA Federation's upcoming Annual Meeting in June.

Granovsky Award for Campaign Excellence

Named after the late Jewish community leader Phil Granovsky, the award is a tribute to individuals who exemplify the best in UJA Federation campaigning.

ABE GLOWINSKY

Among his numerous leadership roles, Abe is perhaps best known for his strong support of the UJA Federation Walk with Israel. In addition to co-chairing the event for the last two years, Abe's clothing manufacturing company has been a major Walk with Israel sponsor for several years. His more than 10 year involvement with UJA Federation also includes serving as Vice Chair of Campaign 2002, and Chair of the Fashion and Goods and Services Division which have grown significantly under his leadership.

""Volunteering is important to me because, as I began to get older, I realized how fortunate I was that I was in a position that allowed me to give back to the community, to those who were less fortunate than I. The more I got involved, the more I realized how much work was needed to be done both locally and overseas. I met and befriended so many others who had similar aspirations - to make our world a little better place."

Leadership Development Awards

Leadership Development Awards were established to encourage young men and women to assume community leadership roles. The awards are presented to individuals who demonstrate extraordinary community commitment and service.

RICHARD DIAMOND

Richard didn't miss a beat in getting involved with UJA Federations Young Leadership Division after moving to Toronto from Montreal in 1998. During the last four years, Richard, who is founding Chair of the National Young Leadership Executive of UIA Federation's Canada, has been the driving force behind many new national YL initiatives including creation of the national Ben Gurion Society, annual missions to the former Soviet Union and regular national retreats and conferences for the YL Executive.

"The best federations and campaigns in my mind are those which can successfully bring together the main constituents of their communities into a strong force for leadership, community service and fund-raising. This is why I am so passionate about Young Leadership. It must be the heart and soul of any vital federation. This is what I am working towards."

ALLEN GALES

For nearly seven years Allen has assumed key roles in both UJA Federation and its Board of Jewish Education. He is currently a member of UJA Federation's Board of Directors, Finance and Administration and Community Planning and Allocations Committees. Allen's strong support for Jewish education includes membership on the BJE's Board of Directors and Executive as well as serving as Treasurer of United Synagogue Day Schools.

"The reason I chose to volunteer was because I wanted to make a difference in strengthening our Jewish Community."

Shem Tov Honourees

The Shem Tov Awards are presented to leaders representing the highest levels of excellence in volunteer service in Toronto's Jewish community.

HELEN FINDER GUTTMAN

BATHURST JEWISH COMMUNITY CENTRE

Helen Finder Guttman is currently President of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre where she has been an active volunteer since 1994. Helen has also been deeply involved with UJA Federation for more than 10 years serving on its Board of Directors and as Vice Chair of Community Development. She is also a member of UJA Federation's Women's Campaign & Advocacy Executive as well as the Canada Israel Experience Management Committee.

"I volunteer not only because I am the child of survivors, not only for the sake of my children, not only because I believe in tzedakah and tikun olam, but because of the sense of accomplishment I get from my involvement. The challenges are often great – the rewards even greater."

AGI MANDEL

JEWISH CAMPUS SERVICES OF GREATER TORONTO

For the last three years Agi has worked tirelessly promoting the Jewish campus experience in almost every aspect of JCS, including its arts and culture program, its governance structure and financial resource development. Agi is currently Vice-President of Jewish Campus Services and Chair of the Fundraising Committee for the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life. She is also former Chair of UJA Federation's Women's Campaign & Advocacy and a Board member of Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

"For me, voluntarism stems from the pride I feel in belonging to a people that believes each of us is responsible for the other."

ALAN MOSTYN

TORONTO JEWISH FREE LOAN CASSA

Alan has been an active volunteer with TJFLC for over 20 years. In addition to serving as President from 1991-1993, Alan has held several key positions in the agency, including legal counsel, Loan Committee Chair and presently Policy Committee Chair and Co-chair of Special Events. In 2001 Alan was the recipient of TJFLC's Most Valuable Volunteer Award.

"I have been an active volunteer at TJFLC for over twenty years and have found volunteering here to be a stimulating, rewarding and challenging experience."

STEPHANIE OLIN CHAPMAN

KEHILLA RESIDENTIAL PROGRAMME

A trained architect and real estate consultant, Stephanie has been the Executive Director of the Kehilla Residential Programme for 10 years. She has most recently been instrumental in the successful development and completion of the Baycrest 2 Neptune Drive Life Lease Project for Jewish seniors. Her extensive voluntarism includes work with UJA Federation, the Jewish Camp Council, the Canadian Cancer Society and Chai Tikvah.

"Volunteering is more than an obligation. It provides an opportunity to share my good fortunes in life while teaching my children by example so that hopefully they will continue the tradition."

BERNICE ROYCE

CIRCLE OF CARE

Bernice has been a volunteer at Circle of Care since 1997. Her extensive involvement in the agency includes being a member of the Circle of Care Board of Directors, chairing the Volunteer Services and Coordination Committee and substituting as a driver for Kosher Meals on Wheels. Bernice is also an active member of the Temple Sinai Social Action Committee and a volunteer with NaMeRes working with the homeless.

"Volunteering gives so much to all concerned. Much needed help to the agency, service to the community and a sense of fulfillment to the volunteer."

MARK SARNER

MILES NADAL JEWISH COMMUNITY CENTRE

For the last 10 years Mark has been an active volunteer with the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre (formerly Bloor Jewish Community Centre), lending his marketing expertise to numerous aspects of the agency's operations, including a major restructuring which took place in 1994. In addition to his current role as President of the Miles Nadal Centre's Property Board, Mark has served as Chair of the Nadal Centre/UJA Federation Joint Management and Marketing Committee.

"Volunteering is a matter of the heart. I feel connected to a greater purpose through serving an institution and a community I love."

RHONA SHULMAN

UJA FEDERATION BOARD OF JEWISH EDUCATION

Jewish education is a priority for Rhona Shulman in both her professional and volunteer life. A project coordinator for the Toronto District School Board, Rhona is also Chair of the BJE's Tikun Chaim Advisory Committee and a member the BJE's Board of Directors.

"I believe that many of the achievements in the Toronto Jewish educational community have come about as a result of an incredibly rich and skilled collaboration between dedicated professional staff and volunteers. I am proud to have shared as a volunteer in this most rewarding experience."

A TRIBUTE

It is with great pleasure and pride that I welcome you to the eighth annual Salute to our Community Volunteers. The men and women highlighted in these pages have made voluntarism a priority in their lives, thereby enhancing all our lives.

This year, in addition to recognizing the individual contributions of our dedicated volunteers, I would also like to congratulate all our community organizations that came forward in support of Israel. Their unified efforts on behalf of Israel and the Jewish people is testament to the strength and integrity of our community and a tremendous source of pride to us all.

WITH ISRAEL NOW

Dear Friends,

While these past several months have indeed been some of the most difficult days ever faced by Israel, the unity of the Jewish people has never been stronger.

As Director General of Keren Hayesod, I have visited many Jewish communities around the world which are rallying behind Israel in her fight for survival. It is truly reassuring and empowering to witness first hand the solidarity of Jews all over the world with Israel when most of the non-Jewish world has turned away.

Toronto's Jewish community, in particular, has shown itself to be one of Israel's staunchest supporters and a model for all other communities to emulate. Your passion and commitment are truly felt across the great distances that geographically separate our two countries. Your dedication is a tremendous source of comfort and strength.

I congratulate you for all your efforts on behalf of Israel and the Jewish people. You are leading the way, with remarkable community unity, in both fundraising and sending missions to Israel at a time when each and every visit counts.

Thank you for your support and for setting a standard of support which the world can follow.

Gad Ben-Ari
Director General, Keren Hayesod

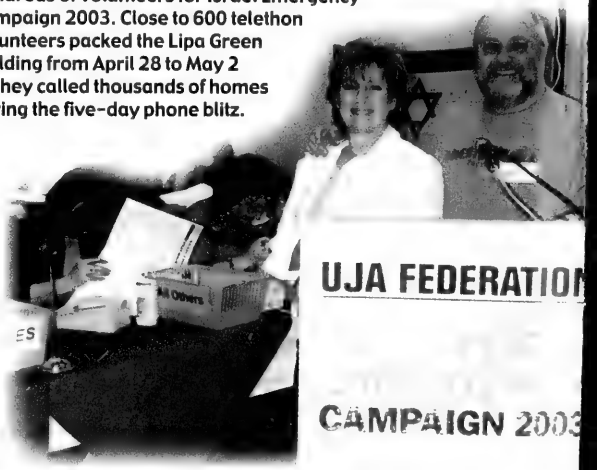
MISSIONS LIFT ISRAELI MORALE

Thirty young Torontonians joined forty others from across Canada last month on a unique, week-long volunteering mission to Israel. Some participants distributed food to the needy while others sorted, stocked and counted medical equipment, clothing and other goods. The mission was made possible through generous subsidies from the UJA Federation system. The trip was closely followed by two others involving students from the GTA, and former birthright israel participants.

UJA Federation's ambitious monthly missions schedule has brought 1000 participants to Israel.

EMERGENCY TELETHON BLITZ

UJA Federation is mobilizing thousands of donors and hundreds of volunteers for Israel Emergency Campaign 2003. Close to 600 telethon volunteers packed the Lipa Green Building from April 28 to May 2 as they called thousands of homes during the five-day phone blitz.



PHONING FOR ISRAEL

Telephone lines on Parliament Hill were buzzing with thousands of calls from 500 members of Toronto's Jewish community on Sunday, April 7, during a one day Phone For Israel campaign, under the auspices of Israel Now Consortium and Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region. Canadian Members of Parliament from coast to coast received phone calls, e-mails and faxes urging them to express stronger support for Israel. This united effort helped community members to vent their frustration with Canadian foreign policy in the Middle East.

We can do it together.

A REMARKABLE CELEBRATION

What a party! More than 10,000 people demonstrated the true spirit of Toronto's Jewish community on Yom Ha'atzmaut – Israel's Independence Day – as they marched from the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre to Earl Bales Park to celebrate Israel's 54th birthday. The festivities not only attracted Jewish community members of all ages but Christian friends of Israel as well.

The Solidarity March along Bathurst Street was one of many Yom Ha'atzmaut events.

TORONTO RALLIES FOR ISRAEL

It was the largest Israel solidarity gathering that Ottawa had ever seen. On April 21, more than 15,000 people – at least half of them from Toronto – rallied on Parliament Hill.

UJA Federation organized nearly 100 buses and one airplane, chartered from Toronto for this historic event, sponsored by the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa and Canadian Jewish Congress.

UJA Federation also organized several buses and an aircraft so that 1,000 Torontonians could attend April's massive Israel rally in Washington, which attracted over 100,000 participants.

On March 24, Yuli Edelstein, Israel's Deputy Minister of Immigrant Absorption spoke at Mel Lastman Square to a crowd of more than 2,500 who demonstrated against terror in Israel and around the world.

WALKING INTO HISTORY

The massive turn-out for UJA Federation's Walk with Israel this past Victoria Day was the largest single-day Israeli solidarity event in the history of Toronto. Close to 25,000 men, women and children took to the streets, forming a sea of blue and white on behalf of Israel, before filling the SkyDome for the Walk's Israel Festival.

Keynote speaker Ra'anan Gissin, Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's principal spokesperson and key advisor, noted the Walk's significance. "To know that we have the support of the Jewish people here in Toronto, in Canada and abroad is even more important than the money in some ways. The fact that we – as Jews come together, no matter where we live, is what keeps us strong as a nation. When we work together, we can accomplish anything."

Beth Tzedec Congregation

Founded to preserve Judaism, to inculcate belief in G-d and reverence for our heritage, to translate Jewish spiritual values into terms of present day thought and action, to revitalize Jewish traditional practices in synagogue and home, and to cultivate Hebrew language and literature.

Margaret Weinstein

"As a Hesed volunteer, I hope that I've helped make a difference in the lives of all of the people that I have served. Each of those experiences have had meaning and have left residual memories with me. A mitzvah is a mitzvah."

Prof studies environmental politics at U of T

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Globalization is heralded by some as a bright new historical phenomenon, but to Steven Bernstein, it's essentially old wine in new bottles.

A 36-year-old University of Toronto political scientist whose academic interests embrace global environmental politics, Bernstein claims there is really nothing novel about globalization.

"Many researchers have pointed out that other epochs in history fit the conditions that people think of when they say we are in a period of increasing globalization," he explains in an interview.

"But people forget that the era just before World War I was also very highly open, and a lot of trans-border activity occurred, even more than today by some measures."

Yet, he acknowledges, the world has changed tremendously since the great war. As he puts it: "The speed of transactions is much faster owing to incredible and unprecedented technological advances in telecommunications, travel and computers."

A former journalist who joined U of T three years ago, Bernstein believes that politicians have two responsibilities in relation to globalization.

First, they must ensure that its beneficial effects are more evenly shared. Second, they must try to minimize its negative repercussions.

Bernstein, a graduate of U of T and the University of Western Ontario, sympathizes with those who fear that globalization means a loss of control over their own destinies.

But if politicians make the right choices, globalization may not turn out to be so threatening a force after all, he adds.

An environmentalist who has charted the inextricable relationship between economic growth and a sustainable ecosystem, he is keenly interested in the current debate about the yet-to-be ratified Kyoto Protocol.

Designed to reduce greenhouse gas emissions produced by consumers and business, Kyoto has run into formidable opposition from the United States. The Americans contend Kyoto would damage their economy – a claim supported by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and the Canadian Manufacturers & Exporters. As a result of the controversy, Canada appears hesitant to ratify the 1997 treaty, which was negotiated by 150 countries.

"My impression is that [Canada] remains committed to ratifying it," he observes. "It would be a major embarrassment for Canada if we didn't."

Since Kyoto's costs and benefits have not been determined, Bernstein cautions, advocates and opponents would do well to pause and reflect. "The economic debate is a complex one, and right now, we're hearing a lot of hyperbole."

On the other hand, he points out, Canada stands to lose by withdrawing from Kyoto. The science behind Kyoto is exceedingly strong, and there is a consensus that climate change, with all its effects, is likely to increase in the future.

In short, he argues that Kyoto, while only a first step, represents a serious attempt to shift the world's dependence away from carbon-intensive fuels such as oil and coal, the root cause of accelerating climate change.

Bernstein's interest in globalization and the environment dates back to his days as a U of T graduate student.

"I was interested in studying the potential for the international community to address important global problems, as well as the constraints under which such action occurs."

Long before he turned his attention to such weighty matters, Bernstein – the son of Milton, a lawyer, and Temmy – dabbled in journalism.

At the University of Western Ontario, he was the managing editor of the student newspaper, the Gazette. Later, he was a reporter at the London Free Press and on the Ontario desk of Canadian Press in Toronto.

"I covered a great many things, normal kinds of stuff and some feature writing," he recalled. "I went back and forth between journalism and graduate school."

Bernstein eventually decided journalism was too limiting in terms of his freedom to investigate topics that mattered.

Besides, he had always planned to pursue a career in research. "I realized I had more potential to make a contribution to society as a teacher and researcher."

Bernstein, whose wife Linda White is also a U of T political science professor, has made good on his ambition.

Last year, he and Benjamin Cashore – a Yale University professor of forestry and environmental studies whom he met in graduate school – won the John McMenemy Prize.

It is awarded to the author or authors of the best scholarly article, in English or French, published in the Canadian Journal of Political Science.

"Our article showed how international and transnational pressures helped to improve forest practices and promote sustainable forestry in British Columbia despite global economic pressures."

They chose eco-forestry as their topic because it is a good example of globalization. "Canada exports more forest products than any other country, and there is a lot of foreign investment in that sector. So it's economically globalized to a large degree."

Bernstein's book, The Compromise of Liberal Environmentalism, published by Columbia University Press in 2001, also bridges the divide between globalization and the environment.

His thesis is that when environmental concerns swell, they are usually addressed by governments in an open economic order characterized by global growth, free trade and liberal economies.

"This trend has allowed environmental concerns to gain a great deal of backing, especially in developing countries. Yet it's still a big question whether the world's environmental problems can be easily addressed in this framework."

Bernstein's growing reputation in his field is such that he and associates from McMaster University were recently given a $3.8 million grant to study globalization.

CANADA ISRAEL EXPERIENCE

Ottawa police warn of possible shul attack

OTTAWA — The police here have warned the local Jewish community that they have received an intelligence report of a possible incident in June against an unspecified Jewish synagogue in the city.

"We recognize that this information could be troubling and unsettling to you, your family and friends," police Chief Vince Bevan said in a message to the Jewish community last Friday.

"In issuing this advisory, we are attempting to balance the need to provide the community with as much accurate information as possible, while not creating undue alarm, or worse yet, satisfy those who would prey on, or create, unwarranted community fear," he said.

In a statement, the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa/Vaad Ha'ir (JCCO) said measures have been taken "to ensure... security and safety procedures are being followed" and that the community is "working with the Ottawa Police to reevaluate the situation" at all community facilities.

In addition, the JCCO said Ottawa Police are increasing surveillance around Jewish institutions.

The JCCO said the community plans to go ahead with all its scheduled events.

"Unfortunately security has become a necessary consideration for Jewish facilities and events for some time now," the JCCO said in its statement.

"We do not intend to allow threats or fear to deter us from gathering as a community, strengthening our connections and continuing to add to the wonderful fabric of the Ottawa community."

Director of Donor Services
Required for
UJA Federation of Greater Toronto

UJA FEDERATION, the Jewish community's central organization responsible for funding dozens of educational and social services, is seeking a Director of Donor Services.

The successful candidate will be primarily responsible for the co-ordination of donor services - pledge redemption, administering financial transactions (e.g. stocks, bonds) and customer services.

Experience should include the following:

- A proven knowledge of the Jewish community at-large, and Jewish agencies
- A minimum of 5 years experience in fundraising, accounting, business administration, or customer service

Winnipeg walkthon nets $20,000 for Israel

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A walkathon here on May 12 raised $20,000 for Israel.

As with a community rally on April 14 that attracted 2,500 people to the steps of the Manitoba legislature, the walkathon was organized on short notice by a group of concerned individuals unaffiliated with the community leadership.

"We wanted to do something to help Israel," said Sara Lesserson, one of the organizers of the walkathon, in which about 600 participants trekked from the Asper Jewish Community Campus to nearby Assiniboine Park and back.

Winnipeggers are also contributing generously to the CJA's emergency campaign, which began Sunday, May 5 with breakfast meetings at four city synagogues.

The campaign started a little later than similar drives in other communities because much of the local leadership was on a solidarity mission to Israel in late April.

Nonetheless, said CJA executive director Gerry Koffman, as of mid-May, contributors had donated $870,000 toward a goal of $1.1 million.

He said the mid-May total came despite the fact some major donors had been out of town.

"We are getting 40 letters a day at the office in addition to phone calls and people coming in," Koffman said. "I am always proud of this community's response. We have had over 1,000 gifts and very few people have asked for statements."

He said the money raised in the emergency campaign will go to social service needs in Israel. The drive ends in mid-June, when work begins on the annual Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/CJA campaign.

Louisa Raizman, spokesperson for Canadians for Israel, the ad hoc group that organized the rally in mid-April, was also proud of the response to that event.

"We were very pleased with the level of support from the community," she said. "We had people of all ages and backgrounds at the rally. And we are particularly happy that the rally was peaceful.

"We hope to have more public events to show solidarity with Israel," she said.

Organizers videotaped the rally and intend to send copies of the video to Israeli schools.

"We want to show Israelis that they are not alone," Raizman said.

Thousands march to show 'unwavering support for Israel'

By MICHAEL REGENSTREIF
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL – Thousands of Montrealers of all ages braved unseasonably cold weather on May 19 for the city's 30th annual 18-kilometre March to Jerusalem

The event shows the community's "unwavering support for Israel," and is "more relevant than ever," said march co-chair Bonnie Paperman.

At the opening ceremonies before the first marchers departed from the Ben-Gurion checkpoint at 1 Cummings Square, Jewish community leaders and politicians mingled with the crowd and spoke.

Shlomo Avital, Israel's consul general in Montreal, said the march is one of the community's greatest events.

Montreal Mayor Gérard Tremblay attended the opening ceremonies and spoke of his "profound attachment to the Jewish community." He wished the marchers well on their journey through "the many diverse neighbourhoods of the city," adding that all Montrealers are united in the values of "love, justice and peace."

Rabbi Sidney Shoham of Congregation Beth Zion spoke about the central importance of Jerusalem to the Jewish people and deplored the violence and bloodshed that the "city of peace" has seen. He told the marchers to walk "with pride and dignity" and prayed for a "ray of peace to shine on Jerusalem."

Morton Besner, president of the Jewish Cultural Association, the march's sponsor, recalled that "30 years ago, four men had a great idea to express our solidarity with the wonderful people of Israel."

Two of the four, Gordon Brown and Joe Ain, have since passed away, and Ruby Zimmerman sent his best wishes from Israel. Herbie Paperman, the fourth founder of the March to Jerusalem, was beside Besner on the podium.

FEDERATION CJA president Steven Cummings referred to the march as a symbol of the community's "solidarity, love and support with our brothers and sisters in Israel." He also announced that the Israel Emergency Campaign in Montreal had already raised $15 million.

Other dignitaries included Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler, D'Arcy McGee MNA Lawrence Bergman, Montreal city councillors Robert Libman and Michael Applebaum, and Daniel Gal, Israel's former consul general in Montreal.

The runners of the Wolf Pack led the way as the marchers began to make their way through the streets of Montreal to "Jerusalem." March co-ordinator Aviva Miller told The CJN that between 10,000 and 15,000 marchers participated. Proceeds from the march help fund cultural exchange programs with Israel.

The route brought the marchers back to Cummings Square and Checkpoint Jerusalem. As they finished the march, the participants were joined by thousands of others for the annual YM-YWHA Israeli Street Festival, where animators got the crowd dancing, to Israeli horahs one moment and to disco beats the next.

Impartial analyses dispute 'massacre'

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The perennial issue of journalistic responsibility was thrown into high relief during Israel's military operations in Jenin. Some newspapers carried banner headlines of a "massacre" on page one; others resisted the temptation to repeat unsubstantiated statistics. A few journalists are beginning to reflect on the reporting about the massacre that never was. No doubt the Jenin coverage will become a textbook case study of journalistic fairness and accuracy.

One effort at impartial analysis took place on "CBC News: Sunday" on May 12. Co-host Carole MacNeil introduced the subject by asking what really happened. "Reporters were barred from entering Jenin by Israeli troops, but almost immediately reports began to circulate that a massacre had taken place. Many major media outlets around the world, such as the BBC and the Independent in England and the Toronto Star here in Canada, reported body counts of up to 500."

Evan Solomon, the other co-host, pointed out that according to Human Rights Watch, which conducted its own investigation, "52 Palestinians and 23 Israelis were killed." This confirmed what Israel had maintained all along. "So," asked Solomon, "how did the media get it all so wrong?"

Solomon interviewed the Toronto Star's Olivia Ward, one of the first Canadian reporters to arrive in Jenin, and the Globe and Mail's Marcus Gee. Ward initially defended her use of the word "massacre," citing figures of 400 Palestinians killed, and acknowledged that she received these figures from the Palestinians. She also explained that she reported Israel's denial. Solomon challenged Ward's "balance" by asserting that the sensationalism surrounding a term like "massacre" tends to overwhelm a statement of denial. "Does that already bias the whole context of the conversation?" he asked.

Gee pointed out that "certain reporters leapt to conclusions" without knowing the facts: "I mean, they went in; they saw terrible destruction, which was shocking, but these reports of 500 dead turned out to be completely false." Also proven false were other charges of gross human rights violations like mass graves, a refrigerated crematorium, and a portable morgue, which the Palestinians, eager to sell the "massacre" narrative, promoted to the media.

Phil Reeves, of Britain's Independent, who is known for his anti-Israel perspective, reported that "a monstrous war crime Israel has tried to cover up has been exposed." As it turned out, what was exposed was Reeves' own determination to capitalize on unsubstantiated allegations as fact.

Gee explained that especially in the "overheated atmosphere" surrounding Jenin, reporters "have to be absolutely scrupulous… to base their reports purely on the facts." He added, "and if you're going to say 'reports of a massacre'… you have to make clear immediately that these reports could not be verified, and also report the Israeli response. Finally… you have to go in and find out what really happened," as some news organizations, like the New York Times and the Washington Post did, to their everlasting credit.

While "CBC News: Sunday" is to be commended in this instance for asking the right questions, one element is still missing: a critical assessment of how CBC-TV News itself covered Jenin. More on that next week.

Police search for clues in Quebec City shul blast

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Quebec City police said fragments of a pipe bomb were being tested last week by forensic experts in Montreal to see if the results could lead to whoever firebombed the city's only synagogue in the early morning hours of May 19.

It was the third violent attack against a Canadian synagogue in 19 months.

The explosion at Beth Israel Ohev Shalom Synagogue, which occurred at about 1:30 a.m, caused damage estimated at several hundred dollars, said president Simon Jacobs in an interview.

But it produced shock waves the tiny community of about 100 Jews is not likely to recover from for some time, he added.

"This is traumatic for everybody," said Jacobs, a native of England and violist with the Quebec Symphony Orchestra who has been living in the provincial capital for 14 years.

"The general reaction has been: 'What's happening here in Quebec?' The scary part is that it was a bomb. Somebody made something that is not a simple device."

Jacobs did not speculate as to who might have been responsible for the attack on the 30-year-old synagogue, an off-white stucco bungalow located on de Mérici Avenue, a partly commercial, partly residential street about a half-hour walk from Old Quebec and within walking distance of the Plains of Abraham.

Jacobs said the synagogue itself "is pretty invisible, very low key."

But he, along with Rabbi Aaron Sultan, believe that the sense of security among the Jews of Quebec City has been put to the test by pro-Palestinian protests in the city in recent weeks that have included placards like "Kill the Infidel Jew."

Rabbi Sultan, who commutes between Montreal and Quebec City, said the firebombing was part of the wave of anti-Semitic incidents happening around the world.

"Of course this was an anti-Semitic act," Rabbi Sultan said, suggesting that it was fuelled by the anti-Israel and anti-Jewish climate at local universities.

He said he probably would have been sleeping in his quarters at the shul that night had he not left for Montreal after Shabbat to help his 17-year-old son Meir prepare for his departure to Israel to study at a yeshiva. He said his son sometimes sleeps in a room at the shul only "55 centimetres" from where the explosion occurred.

The explosive device was believed to be a small pipe bomb that was propped up against the synagogue's front door.

The blast pierced through the steel-reinforced front door, shattered a door-length window and damaged the ceiling, spewing plaster and dust over religious articles in the interior vestibule.

An anonymous, non-Jewish donor phoned the Sun Youth Organization to offer a reward of $5,000 for information leading to the arrest and conviction of the perpetrator and to pay for the damage, Sun Youth director Sid Stevens told The CJN.

The donor told Stevens he made the gesture because "today it's a synagogue, tomorrow a church."

At writing, however, no arrests had been made for the firebombing. A 27-year-old man who was making anti-Semitic statements in the area of the shul was detained by police but later released because of a lack of evidence, Quebec City police spokesperson Jean Minguy said.

"For now there is no progress," he said.

Jewish community leaders have condemned the attack as intolerable.

Joseph Gabay, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q), said the bombing was an act of defiance against "order" and was symbolically and deliberately made in the capital of the province.

"There's a message there, and we have to read it."

He warned that the bombing has to be seen in the context of 55 anti-Semitic incidents across Canada since mid-April, 12 of them in Quebec.

"All big things start with small things," he said. "We have to be very vigilant, very careful not to fall into the same trap France fell into."

The situation, he said, has not been helped by the media, which tend to produce "snapshots" of the situation in Israel without adequate background information or context.

Jacobs also blamed a "climate fostered in the media" for setting the stage for the incident.

Shortly after the bombing, Gabay received a personal call from Premier Bernard Landry condemning the bombing and providing assurances that the province would not tolerate any expressions of intolerance, xenophobia or anti-Semitism.

Liberal MNAs Lawrence Bergman and Russel Copeman last week visited the site of the bombing, along with Israeli consul general in Montreal Shlomo Avital.

B'nai Brith officials from Montreal also planned to visit Quebec City to meet with the Jewish community and assess the situation.

In a press release last week, Steven Slimovitch, B'nai Brith's Montreal-based national legal counsel, said authorities "must deal with this most recent attack against a Canadian synagogue with a firm hand… No attack on a house of worship should be tolerated in Canada."

In an interview, Bergman also deplored the bombing as an intolerable anti-Semitic act and stressed the need to "nip in the bud" any such trend in "a free and open society."

"The Jewish community of Quebec City has a long and glorious history. Every effort has to be made to find those responsible," Bergman said.

Jacobs said synagogue officials will likely put into place security measures that the congregation can ill-afford given the community's size and the synagogue's lack of resources.

Canadians take part in Israeli young leadership seminar

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Already a graduate of the Birthright Israel program, Bryan Epstein recently returned from a second, more intense Israel experience.

He was one of only two Canadians chosen to participate in the sixth Young Jewish Leadership Diplomatic Seminar, organized by the Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

Epstein, who is an investment advisor, and lawyer Jeff Kahane of Calgary, joined 11 young professionals from the United States for two weeks of in-depth touring, meetings with officials, seminars and discussions designed to give them a greater knowledge and understanding of the issues facing Israel today.

Epstein likened the rigorous selection process to applying for a job. "I had to apply, to provide references and to write an essay," he said. That was followed by an interview at the Israeli Embassy in Ottawa.

"When I met the calibre of people on the program, I felt very honoured to have been selected," Kahane said.

Both Epstein and Kahane are transplanted Montrealers who have become actively involved in their local communities. Kahane moved to Calgary in the mid-1970s; Epstein moved to Ottawa in October 2000.

Their two weeks in Israel have had a profound effect on both young men, who experienced both the good and the not-so-good aspects of life in Israel.

"On the last day of the trip, there was a suicide bombing at a coffee stand that injured 70 and killed five," Epstein said. "We were a block away and it really hit home as to what people were discussing with us.

Philanthropists establish tzedakah fund for youth

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The imagination and generosity of a local couple is enabling bar and bat mitzvah youth here to help ensure the future of the city's Jewish community through a new tzedakah program.

Local philanthropists Edna and Saul Goldfarb are always looking for new ways to help their community, and they like to help others perform the mitzvah of tzedakah.

As president of the Ottawa Jewish Community Foundation, Saul has spearheaded, and provided funding for, a number of new programs to encourage people to donate life insurance policies to the foundation.

Anxious to see their grandchildren carry on the family tradition of community involvement, the Goldfarbs came up with the B'nai Mitzvah Club to encourage young people to open funds with the Ottawa Jewish Community Foundation in their own names to begin a lifelong connection to the community.

Although the cost of opening a fund with the foundation is normally $1,000, bar and bat mitzvah youth can do so for as little as $500. As a further enticement, the Goldfarbs will contribute $250, leaving only $250 for the young person and his or her family and friends to add.

They will also match any amount up to $1,000 that a family contributes to open the fund.

"We put a limit of $1,000 on it because I didn't want the parents or grandparents to do this," Edna said.

"I wanted to get the children personally involved. I told them to give me $36; let their parents give me $36; let their grandparents give me $36. The children can give money that they have saved or money that they receive for their bar or bat mitzvah."

To ensure the youths' involvement doesn't end with their bar or bat mitzvah, the Goldfarbs have created a club to maintain contact with them.

To date, there are 28 members and the club is growing quickly.

Jamie Berezin was its first member. At a recent dinner held by Hadassah-WIZO to honour Edna, he spoke about his involvement with the club.

"I felt that by being given the opportunity to create the Jamie Berezin Mitzvah Fund, it was a good chance for me to give tzedakah every year. My fund could grow over the years as contributions could be made towards it for special events.

"By involving us in the work of the foundation and enabling us to disburse our own funds, we learn a lot about the needs of the young, old and disabled," Jamie said.

The Goldfarbs host a summer barbecue at their country home for club members. The young people board a school bus in the city for the trip to the country, where they spend the day swimming, boating, playing tennis and generally enjoying themselves.

They also talk "business," as they are asked to open the mitzvah banks they are given when they start their funds, and count the money they have saved. They are all encouraged to add loonies and toonies on a regular basis to ensure that their funds grow.

Once the funds are able to generate annual interest of $50, the young people will be consulted on how they want the money distributed.

"I would really encourage anyone who is interested in becoming a member of the B'nai Mitzvah Club to do so, not only because this is a mitzvah, but because Mrs. Goldfarb gives great barbecues at her country home," Jamie said.

Anyone interested in setting up a similar project in another city can call Edna at 613-232-9631.

Israeli young leadership seminar

"It is difficult to understand it until you actually see people dying in front of you. The worst part was seeing the chevrah kadishah arriving with their bags [to retrieve bodies and body parts]. I have a keen awareness of the issues and the situation, and it really makes me want to share the message with others."

Both men said visiting Israel left them with a strong sense of identity, though neither considers himself particularly observant.

Kahane said that "in Israel you are a Jew period. Reform, Orthodox, Conservative, yes they distinguish, but first and foremost you are a Jew. I think we put too much emphasis in sub-dividing ourselves."

Kahane and Epstein said they plan to promote solidarity and unity in their communities.

"I intend to do everything I can to create a stronger Jewish community in Calgary," Kahane said. "I think this is important for many reasons. First, if ever the tide of public feelings about Jews changes in [Canada], it is important that we are connected.

"Second, with a strong sense of community, people will be more likely to recognize the importance of the State of Israel to us as Canadians, both from a security perspective and a spiritual perspective.

"Lastly, I have two young daughters. Without close ties with our Jewish community here and a strong community to be tied to, they will likely not value the importance of what it means to be a Jew."

Epstein said he is in the process of helping to organize new activities to bring young professionals together on a regular basis to discuss issues facing Israel and to form bonds of solidarity with the Jewish State.

The seventh Young Jewish Leadership Diplomatic Seminar will be held in Israel from July 21 to Aug. 9. Interested individuals should contact the Israeli Embassy or their local consulate.

Links cited between Holocaust, recent anti-Semitism

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Speakers at the recent annual dinner of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada made connections between the Holocaust and the worldwide increase in anti-Semitism over the past year.

"The very evils that you so heroically combated have resurfaced," said Keith Landy, national president of the Canadian Jewish Congress. "The ugly reality is that almost 60 years after the Holocaust and your role in the defeat of Nazism, virulent anti-Semitism is all too alive and well."

Landy commended the veterans while urging the community to remain vigilant. "You here tonight have faced daunting challenges as you bravely did your duty in service to this great country of ours," he said.

"Your courageous efforts helped raise the curtain on the darkness that had descended upon the world over half a century ago. Let us work together now to ensure that your noble endeavours, and the sacrifices of your fallen comrades, will not have been in vain."

Verna Bruce, assistant deputy minister in the Ministry of Veterans' Affairs, brought greetings from the federal government. "Seventeen thousand Jewish men and women joined arms and fought for this country. At Veterans' Affairs, we would like to do anything we can to help keep these memories alive."

Gerry Levitz, president of the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa, urged local politicians to recognize the contributions of Jewish citizens and to stand up in their defence.

"We were Canadians then and we are Canadians now," said Levitz. "Five hundred men and women from our Ottawa community have served in the armed forces. Don't let another synagogue be defaced in the city of Ottawa without speaking up."

Ottawa Post chaplain Rabbi Reuven Bulka suggested that, as the veterans age, the organization find ways to attract younger members so that the soldiers' legacy is not forgotten.

"You have been a role model for all of us of what it means to have values," he said. "Think very seriously about expanding your membership in the Jewish War Veterans to create categories which would include younger members to carry on the tradition."

Landy said he would like to see a Holocaust museum in Ottawa soon.

"I sincerely hope, in the not too distant future, to hear our government announce that it is honouring its commitment to establish a museum of the Holocaust and human rights," he said.

"Canada must join other western nations in properly commemorating the Shoah. Canada must create an appropriate facility in the nation's capital to teach all visitors, but especially younger generations, about the horrors of racism and hate that many of you here today fought so bravely to defeat."

The dinner, which was held at Agudath Israel Congregation, also included speeches by city councillor Peter Hume, Israeli Ambassador Haim Divon, Rabbi Arnold Fine of Agudath Israel Congregation and incoming Ottawa Post Commander, Paul Bender, the first merchant navy captain to hold the position.

ISRAELI PRODUCTS IN CLASS: Students of Bnos Chaya Mushka School in Toronto recently began an initiative to provide economic relief for Israel by bringing in product wrappings of Israeli products and watching how small purchases add up cumulatively. The project will be followed up with in-depth studies of various cities in Israel where the "most popular" products in Israel are manufactured. Seen here (from left) is Chaya Wagner, Tzippy Trauig and Racheli Gerber.

Sydney businessman heads demining organization

By JULIE ZATZMAN
Special to The CJN

SYDNEY, N.S. — A prominent member of Cape Breton's Jewish community may soon get a chance to apply his organizational skills in Afghanistan.

Irving Schwartz is the founder and chair of the Canadian International Demining Corporation (CIDC), an organization that helps to remove landmines in some of the world's most troubled hot spots.

His Sydney-based organization has already worked in such war-ravaged countries as Bosnia and Herzegovina, Bulgaria, Croatia, Kosovo, Jordan, Mozambique, Peru, Equador, Taiwan and Thailand. When peace is restored to Afghanistan one of the first problems to be dealt with will be the countless landmines buried throughout the countryside.

"The Canadian government would have to request proposals [for demining work]," Schwartz said in an interview. "The government will have to determine what kind of contribution it will make to that effort."

It is still too early for demining operations to begin in Afghanistan, Schwartz said. Military operations are still underway and peace has not been fully restored. But the Sydney businessman, who has had successful ventures in industries ranging from retail sales to telecommunications and school construction, would welcome the opportunity to take CIDC to that country.

"Afghanistan is one of the most heavily mined countries in the world. We would be very ready to go there," he said.

Schwartz, who earned the headline "Thank God It's Monday" in a Cape Breton business magazine a decade ago for his entrepreneurial work, still puts in 12- to 14-hour days. Now, however, most of his work is voluntary. CIDC is only one of many volunteer projects that have attracted his interest.

Volunteerism has been a part of his life since 1947, when he joined the New Waterford volunteer fire department in his home town. He is a board member for the Nova Scotia community college system, has volunteered for the Red Cross and sits on the University College of Cape Breton's board of governors. He has worked to provide employment in job-hungry industrial Cape Breton and has helped launch two growing software companies and an independent cheesecake producer in the Sydney area. He has also worked with Israel Bond committees and B'nai Brith and is a life associate member of Hadassah-Wizo.

But CIDC gives him the most satisfaction these days, he said. "It's the one major opportunity to work on an international problem on a totally voluntary basis."

The organization began in 1996 after a person with an interest in landmines approached him with an idea.

"A fellow came to see me," he said. "He was an ex-soldier and said he knew something about demining. He wanted to start a company to raise landmines."

Schwartz agreed to start the company on the conditions that the office remain in the Sydney area and that it be a not-for-profit corporation.

Funded by corporations, government agencies, NGOs (non governmental organizations) and individuals and groups across North America, CIDC today is recognized as a world leader in its field – training and working with landmine detection dog teams.

Seventy countries are known to be contaminated by landmines. There are hundreds of thousands of landmines in the Balkans and an estimated 300,000 to 2 million in Mozambique, and each landmine lasts up to 100 years.

On any given day, there are at least 60 landmine casualties in the world, most of them civilians. Where there is a threat of landmines, children often can't go to school, farmers can't work their fields and villagers can't return to their settlements.

CIDC, which is supported by the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA), teaches local humanitarian demining organizations and NGOs how to train dog teams to detect landmines. The result is a 500 per cent increase in productivity over traditional detection methods.

CIDC has also just completed a $2.5 million national landmine impact survey for the Mozambique government. The study charts the location of landmine fields as well as detailing their socio-economic impact on the country. Approximately 2,000 villages took part in the study, the first of its kind in Africa.

Giving back to society is something Schwartz and his siblings were brought up to do. The family owned a general store in New Waterford, N.S., during the Depression and knew they were better off than most of their neighbours.

"We saw all kinds of poverty and sadness," he said. "We always felt luckier and knew we had to share some of that."

For his voluntary activities Schwartz was named a Member of the Order of Canada in 1997.

Schwartz said being Jewish motivates him to work on projects such as CIDC.

"Being Jewish comes in there everywhere you are," he said. "You're always constantly aware you're being judged as being Jewish, wherever you go, whatever you do. It's part of us. Whatever we do we keep thinking we're representing Jews. We have a responsibility to do the right thing.

"We've been lucky, we've been allowed to come in to this country and make a living and survive and that's the way I look at it."

Professor's remark did not defame Michaud, court rules

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Jewish community organizations reacted with satisfaction to the news that Yves Michaud, the one-time MNA who triggered an uproar 15 months ago over his comments about Jews, lost a defamation lawsuit earlier this month against an academic who called Michaud's words anti-Semitic.

"We're clearly very happy, very satisfied," said Saulie Zajdel, B'nai Brith, Quebec region's executive director. "Clearly Michaud will have to be more prudent in the comments he makes for public consumption."

In December, 2000, Michaud singled out the virtually all-No voting pattern in referendums of minorities in the provincial riding of D'Arcy McGee, which was taken as a clear allusion to the riding's predominantly Jewish population.

Michaud also said Jews "aren't the only people in the world to have suffered in the history of humanity."

Michaud's suit was against Marc Angenot, a professor of French literature at McGill University, who in an interview with Radio-Canada in the fall of 2001 said Michaud "has the right to make anti-Semitic statements and I have the right to find them contemptible."

Quebec Court Judge Antonio De Michele ruled on May 2 – four months after the case was heard – that even if it wasn't Michaud's intention to say anything anti-Semitic, "a portion of Quebec society perceived and qualified them as such."

De Michele characterized Angenot's remarks as "fair comment in light of the previous remarks made by the plaintiff." Angenot's remarks were "severe," but not slanderous, the judge ruled.

Michaud's original comments, which also included a harsh characterization of B'nai Brith as "anti-Quebec," resulted in his condemnation by the National Assembly in January 2001 in a bipartisan motion put forward by Liberal MNA Lawrence Bergman and PQ MNA André Boulerice. A subsequent effort by Michaud to have the assembly withdraw the denunciation failed.

How is Congregation Darchei Noam different from all other synagogues?

Congregation Darchei Noam is the only Reconstructionist synagogue in Toronto. We search for modern meaning in Judaism while keeping true to tradition. Through dialogue and Torah study we explore the connections between text, tradition, history and culture. A combination of searching and questioning, within the Jewish tradition, creates a Judaism that speaks convincingly to the contemporary Jew.

Participatory, egalitarian, stimulating.

Bush 'interfering' in Palestinian leadership: PA

By ALUF BENN and NATHAN GUTTMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Senior Palestinian Authority negotiator Saeb Erekat accused U.S. President George W. Bush Sunday of "interfering in the elected Palestinian leadership;" following comments by Bush that were critical of Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat.

Bush expressed hope earlier in the day that scrutiny of Arafat's leadership by fellow Palestinians could lead to changes in the Palestinian Authority (PA), which White House advisers say is rife with division.

"There's a new attitude emerging. You're beginning to see talk of reform," Bush said outside a synagogue he visited in St. Petersburg, Russia, before departing for Paris.

"People are beginning to question out loud as to why there hasn't been a success" under Arafat, he said. "Evidently, there's a new attitude emerging among the new leadership in the Palestinian Authority.

"I'm beginning to hear – publicly, I'm beginning to hear, I might add – discussion about, 'Well maybe we ought to reassess how to make the Palestinian Authority more accountable,'" Bush said.

The president's comments followed a report in the New York Times on Sunday that an internal debate in the PA administration over whether to seek Arafat's removal was holding up Middle East peace moves.

One senior official close to Bush argued that casting the advisers into camps oversimplifies the situation. While some are more anti-Arafat than others, there is a consensus that Arab pressure requires Bush to leave the door open in case Arafat backs reform, while working on the assumption that Arafat won't. That means encouraging others to support reform, the official said.

Appearing on CNN's Late Edition Sunday, U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell said Palestinian leaders are "suggesting that there is a need for reform within the authority in order for them to do a better job."

Bush did not cite any evidence of discontent, but U.S. officials noted that Arafat has been pressed from inside his organization to schedule elections.

"He hasn't delivered," Bush said. "He had a chance to secure peace as a result of the hard work of President [Bill] Clinton, and he didn't. He had a chance to fight terror and he hasn't."

Later, in a Paris news conference with French President Jacques Chirac, Bush said he was sending U.S. officials to the Middle East next week. CIA Director George Tenet and Assistant Secretary of State William Burns will work with officials willing to push for reforms, U.S. officials said.

Powell, who is travelling with Bush, told CNN's Late Edition he expected Tenet would "be heading there before the week is out." Burns also is scheduled to go there this week.

Condoleeza Rice, Bush's national security advisor, said Sunday that the United States is not trying to choose the leader of the PA but believes the issue is now under intense review among Palestinians.

"There is indeed a lot of ferment and a lot of talk about reform in the Palestinian Authority," Rice told the Fox News Sunday program, from Russia where she was travelling with the president.

"It is a process and perhaps it's a process that is beginning with discussions among the Palestinians themselves about why they have not had the kind of leadership that is going to bring them security and prosperity and peace with their Israeli neighbour."

Neither Rice nor Powell said Arafat needed to be replaced, as Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has urged, if the peace talks are to go forward.

"Chairman Arafat is the head of the Palestinian Authority, and he is the leader of the Palestinian people," Powell said. "Now, we believe he could be a better leader and could lead the Palestinian Authority in a more effective way."

In related developments, Mossad head Ephraim Halevy visited Washington last week for talks with Tenet on reforms in the PA. On his return to Israel Thursday, Halevy briefed Sharon on the outcome of his discussions in the United States.

Halevy made the trip at the request of Tenet, who also invited intelligence chiefs from Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Jordan, as well as Palestinian representatives. Halevy presented Israel's position that the Palestinian security services should be unified, and that a transparent governing body be set up.

It is not clear if Halevy met with officials from the Arab states.

Israel is demanding that reform of the PA security services run parallel with changes to the Palestinian political, financial and judicial systems. Sharon hopes that the reforms will lead to the marginalization of Arafat.

In recent weeks, Halevy has become Sharon's key contact with the American administration. Halevy has already visited Washington three times as the prime minister's envoy. He has a mandate from the prime minister to discuss Palestinian security reforms with Tenet.

Bush has instructed Tenet to formulate a plan for a unified Palestinian security force, but has delayed the CIA chief's mission to the Middle East until it becomes clear that there is a move towards elections in the PA.

Israeli embassy in Paris gutted by fire

By DANIEL BEN-SIMON
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

PARIS — Israeli embassy staff in Paris were woken early last Thursday morning by calls from the embassy's security officers telling them not to come in to work because the building was on fire and there was "nothing left of it."

Because of the tight security around the building, both the Israeli Foreign Ministry and the French interior ministry believe the fire was not caused by arson. In recent months, restoration work was being carried out on the building and preliminary investigations by the Paris police indicate the fire broke out as a result of work done in the building, perhaps due to a short circuit.

At about 2 a.m. Thursday, a fire broke out and quickly spread throughout the building. It took firefighters more than 10 hours to get it under control by Thursday afternoon.

Embassy staff who entered the building were shocked to discover that all that was left was a gutted outer structure and the staircase.

"I was woken by a call at two in the morning," said the embassy's public relations attache, Yigal Palmor. "They told me, Yigal, the embassy's burning. I turned on my television and saw the shocking pictures. I saw the giant flames consuming the building from all directions. I asked the security officer what was left of the building and he said not much."

Firefighters unroll hoses as they fight a blaze at the Israeli embassy in Paris, which was destroyed by fire early May 23. [RNS/Reuters photo]

Many of the staff couldn't sleep after receiving the news and spent the night outside the embassy. "It's a terrible situation," said the head of the Foreign Ministry's European desk, Danny Shek, who was in touch with embassy staff throughout the night. "The staff stood in the street and saw the building being consumed. The flames destroyed floor after floor. The inside of the building was all made from wood and that's why it went up like a match box."

It isn't clear who owned the stylish building on Rue Rabelais before it was purchased by Israel 25 years ago. Israeli Foreign Ministry legend has it that the owner was well known for his anti-Semitic tendencies and ministry staff joked that had he known what purpose the building served, he would have turned in his grave.

The Paris embassy was considered the most beautiful and the oldest of Israel's embassy buildings. Its first floor was designated a historic site because of the rare pictures and adornments on its walls. Visitors never failed to be impressed by its interior. The first floor served as a reception hall where thousands gathered for Israel's Independence Day celebrations.

The offices, where more than 100 staff worked, were on the upper floors.

Some years ago, after terror attacks against Israeli targets overseas, Rue Rabelais was closed to traffic. Police officers and security agents manned both entrances to the street and day and night checked those coming into the street. Even the embassy's staff had to undergo the checks every day.

"There isn't a chance that anyone could have come into the street without being checked," said a senior Israeli Foreign Ministry official. "Certainly not into the building itself. In order to set fire to such a heavily guarded building, one has to get inside. I served there for many years and I can't see how anyone could do that."

Embassy staff are having a hard time recovering from the blow. A Foreign Ministry spokesperson said the ministry would begin looking for a new location within the next few days and that until then the staff would be spread at locations around the city.

Short circuit cited as possible cause

The mayor of Paris, Bernard Delanoe, spent the night by the embassy with the staff and promised that the municipality would allocate one of its buildings to be used in the meantime by the embassy. The French prime minister, Jean-Pierre Raffarin, and his interior minister, Nicholas Sarkozy, also visited the scene. President Jacques Chirac called Ambassador Eli Bar-Navi to express his sorrow.

But things will not be as they were. Years of history have been lost.

"Everything has gone," said Shek, who in the past served as the embassy's spokesperson. "It's difficult to believe but people have lost all their contact numbers. Everything that was on computer has been destroyed. There is partial backup in Israel, but the written infrastructure of Israeli-French relations has disappeared in the blink of an eye, not to mention authentic documents of enormous historical value."

Palmor concurred with Shek, saying that it was not only the historic building that had been lost, but all the embassy's work. "There are no files, no archives, no names, no lists, no addresses, no connections... We simply have to start from scratch."

The Week in Israel

May 20

• Arkady Wiselman, 40, one of three Israelis killed in a suicide bombing in the Netanya market May 19, was identified as a survivor of the Passover suicide bombing at a seder in Netanya's Park Hotel.

• Defence Minister Binyamin Ben-Eliezer ordered a 225-mile long security fence to be built between Israel and the West Bank. It will have cameras and electronic detection devices and will be finished within six months.

• Jihad Jibril, 40, son of radical Palestinian leader Ahmed Jibril, was killed in Beirut by a bomb placed in his car. Israel denied involvement.

• Prime Minister Ariel Sharon fired four cabinet ministers from the Shas party after they helped defeat his emergency austerity plan in the Knesset.

May 21

• The Palestinian Authority dropped charges against Fuad Shubaki, its chief finance officer and alleged mastermind behind a shipload of arms intercepted by Israel in January, despite documents found by Israel linking him to the ship.

May 22

• Two Israelis were killed and 41 injured in a suicide bombing in Rishon Lezion.

• Marwan Barghouti, the leader of West Bank Fatah militias who was arrested in April by Israel, issued a statement from jail urging Palestinians to keep fighting Israel.

May 23

• The Pi Glilot fuel depot, just off the Tel Aviv-Haifa Highway, was ordered closed after a terrorist bomb exploding under a tanker loading diesel fuel at the site. No one was injured and the fire was put out.

May 24

• Five people were injured after a suicide bomber detonated a car bomb outside a Tel Aviv nightclub.

Graham endorses IDF move into Bethlehem

"When I spoke of withdrawal from the cities and making the lives of the Palestinians easier, I was talking about the second part."

After visiting Yad Vashem on Sunday, Graham met Sharon at his office in Jerusalem.

"We believe the ultimate security of Israel does lie in the establishment of a Palestinian state which operates in conditions which will enable Palestinians to live in dignity and be able to be partners with Israel in the search for peace," Graham told Sharon.

He said the pair "were arguing with one another" over the need to lift the Israeli siege on Palestinian cities, which Israel imposed in an effort to hinder the movement of weapons and suicide bombers.

Graham said it would be "extremely difficult" for Palestinians to hold elections under such conditions.

On Monday, Graham also met with Israeli President Moshe Katsav. They discussed the international community's repeated efforts to bring security to the region.

According to Katsav's office, the president made it clear to Graham that while transforming the Palestinian Authority (PA) into a democracy is vital, it would be useless unless it is accompanied by actions to wipe out terror.

On Sunday, Graham met with PA Chairman Yasser Arafat. Graham was reported to have called for an end to violence on both sides and said peace could only be achieved through negotiations.

"There is no military solution to this problem," Graham said, as reported by Canadian Press.

"We assert the right of Israel and Israelis to live in peace and security, just as we believe that the people in the Palestinian areas should be able to live in peace and security," he added in calling for creation of a Palestinian state.

Graham said Canada has "constantly urged Israel to respect international law" regarding the occupation of Palestinian territories, but called on Palestinians to recognize that "the Israeli population lives in fear of their lives on a daily basis."

Graham also said he would urge the Israeli government to "ease the burden on the life of the Palestinian people" so that normal economic activity can be re-established.

"Without prosperity and growth in the area, people are desperate," he said, adding that "with the end of violence I am confident that [a] new environment can be made to prevail."

Graham was concluding a week-long Mideast visit, during which he also met with Egyptian and Jordanian officials.

Marie-Christine Lilkoff, a spokesperson from Graham's office told The CJN the minister conveyed Canada's support for the pursuit of a negotiated settlement to the Middle East conflict and Canada's commitment to a search for a just and lasting peace.

As friendly nations, she said, "Canada and Israel are able to discuss a range of issues in which we have different points of view, and the minister's visit provided the opportunity to have a productive and wide-ranging discussion."

Launch of satellite due soon

By AMNON BARZILAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Final preparations are under way for the launch of the Israeli spy satellite Ofek 5, by the Israeli satellite launcher, Shavit. Ofek 5 will replace its predecessor, Ofek 3, which burned up in space after five full years of service.

The next generation of satellites is slated to have a life-span of eight years.

Ofek 5 is expected to be launched sometime soon, a Defence Ministry spokesperson said.

When released, it will orbit the earth at a height of 400 to 600 kilometres. The satellite was developed by Israel Aircraft Industries (IAI), as was the Shavit launcher. Two of the three launcher's engines were developed by Israel Military Industries.

Among the equipment to be carried by Ofek 5 is a telescopic camera designed by Elbit Systems.

The success of the satellite, however, depends on its launcher. According to reports, the Shavit is an offshoot of the Jericho surface-to-surface missile. Because of the sensitivity of the systems installed in the satellite and its mission, it was decided to launch it in Israel, from an Israeli launcher. However, due to problems of space, it will be launched from east to west, against the earth's rotation, so that should there be any problems, it will land in the sea, rather than in enemy territory.

Ofek 3 went out of action more than a year and a half ago, and since then, the Defence Ministry has mostly made use of photographs taken by the commercial satellite Eros, also developed by IAI. Elbit and private investors are currently working on the second in the series of commercial satellites, which is expected to be launched at the end of next week.

Israel's spy satellite program experienced a setback in November 1998 when the launch of the Ofek 4 satellite failed because of a problem with the Shavit launcher.

Wiesel's journey home a remarkable documentary

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

Elie Wiesel Goes Home provides some of the most haunting images and moving narration I have ever experienced. This film, finally available on video, documents Elie Wiesel's return to his home town of Sighet in Transylvania. The village is now part of Romania, but before the War, was ruled by Hungary.

It was not Wiesel's first trip back, but in the past he had only been there for a day or a night. This time he spent a little more time in the village in an attempt to find some connection to his childhood.

It was the 50th anniversary of the deportation of the Jews of Sighet, at which time Wiesel and his entire family were shipped out to Auschwitz.

In his past journeys, Wiesel had noted that the town was still there, the houses were still there, everything remained the same, only the Jews were gone. On this trip, even most of the houses were gone and there was little left of the flourishing Jewish community Wiesel remembered from his childhood.

The film does show one person that Wiesel found – a 91 year old Jewish man who had escaped into the forest and had thus survived the War. This man, Erno Fische, was the brother of the Wiesel family doctor and gives Wiesel a number of papers and documents, including a farewell letter written by members of the Fische family the day they were deported to Auschwitz.

In an ironic twist, the town council of Sighet makes Wiesel an honorary citizen of the town, although Wiesel had been born there and had lived his first 15 years there.

Following his sojourn in Sighet, Wiesel visits Auschwitz. Slowly, somberly, with only one friend accompanying him, Wiesel walks through the roadways and fields of the death camp where he was imprisoned. There is no talk or discussion. Both men are lost in their thoughts and their memories, especially as they approach the remains of the crematorium.

As all this is taking place, Filmmaker Judit Elet intersperses the scenes of Wiesel with archival film and still photos. At the same time, actor William Hurt reads from some of Wiesel's most striking passages from his first book Night and other of his writings.

The effect is almost like walking with ghosts, not only in Auschwitz, but also in Sighet. From the shots of Wiesel's face one gets the impression that he has the weight of six million souls on his shoulders. And so he does. No other writer has come closer to expressing the anguish and pain of living with the kinds of memories that reside in every survivor's mind.

This extraordinary film received some limited theatrical release in the United States and was shown at a number of film festivals under the title To Speak the Unspeakable: The Message of Elie Wiesel.

Now everyone has the opportunity to see it for themselves. Choices Inc. has released it on VHS and DVD formats which can be purchased for $29.95 (US) at www.ChoicesVideo.net, by calling (888) 570-5400, by fax at (310) 360-8501 or by mail at 369 S. EMMA RICHLER TO TAKE FICTION PRIZE AT JEWISH BOOK AWARDS

Emma Richler, daughter of the late Mordecai, has been named winner of the coveted Beatrice and Martin Fischer fiction prize in the 14th annual Canadian Jewish Book Awards, next week at the Leah Posluns Theatre.

Emma Richler

Richler's book Sister Crazy, published last year by Knopf Canada, "is remarkable for a first novel," said the awards founding chair, Adam Fuerstenberg. "Part of it is an inner struggle for identity… it's really a coming of age novel with interesting stylistic devices, even some experimentation."

According to Fuerstenberg, Emma's brother Noah, a writer-editor at the National Post, will accept the award for Emma, who lives in London. Like each of the nine awards to be handed out this year, the fiction prize comes with an honorarium of between $500 and $1,000.

Eleanor Wachtel, host of the popular CBC radio show Writers & Company, is slated to read a passage from Sister Crazy during the awards ceremony.

Other winners include William Weintraub, whose book Getting Started (McClelland & Stewart) has merited the award for biography/memoir. The book contains a delightful account of Weintraub's friendships with Mordecai Richler, Mavis Gallant and Brian Moore in the 1950s.

Toronto novelist Cary Fagan was named winner in the children's literature category for The Market Wedding, while Rabbi Erwin Schild receives the prize for Holocaust literature for The Very Narrow Bridge. Eric Lawee takes the award for biblical-rabbinic scholarship for Isaac Abarbanel's Stance Toward Tradition; Morton Weinfeld receives the prize for scholarship on a Canadian Jewish theme for Like Everyone Else… But Different; Simcha Simchovitch takes the Yiddish translation prize for The Song That Never Died; Janine Stingel receives the prize in Canadian history for Social Discredit; and Joseph Sherman takes the poetry award for American Standard.

The 14th annual awards ceremony takes place Tuesday, June 4, 7:30 p.m. at the Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst St. A reception follows; the public is cordially invited and there is no charge for admission.

Joseph Sherman Reading: Noted P.E.I. poet Joseph Sherman, winner of the poetry award at this year's Jewish Book Awards, is scheduled to read and discuss his poetry the day after the awards ceremony.

Sherman, who lives in Charlottetown, is the author of five books of poetry; the most recent is American Standard, published by Oberon Press. Sherman's visit is made possible through the generosity of the League of Canadian Poets. Hear him read in the Lipa Green Building, 4600 Bathurst St., room 423, Wednesday, June 5, 12:30 to 2 p.m.

Cinematheque's June Offerings: Some amazing films are part of Cinematheque Ontario's June season. Andrzej Munk's Passenger (1963), which focuses on a reunion of a Nazi guard and a concentration camp inmate aboard an ocean liner, was regarded as the Polish filmmaker's pinnacle achievement; he died in a car crash near Auschwitz during its filming. Three more films by Munk are also included.

The films of cinematic explorers Yervant Gianikian and Angela Ricci Lucchi, as well as Joris Ivens, Budd Boetticher and others, are also being shown. There is also going to be a screening of one of my favourite films, Billy Wilder's The Apartment. May 30 to June 29. 416-968-FILM or www.bell.ca/filmfest.

Israeli band creating a real buzz, man

By JOSEPH SERGE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — If you think the best rock 'n'roll came out of San Francisco and London in the late '60s, this hot Israeli band will throw you for a loop.

Sounding at times like The Beatles and early Pink Floyd and at times like The Byrds, The Hollies and The Beach Boys, RockFour has recently released its first international CD – Another Beginning.

The group – based in Tel Aviv – will be playing three concerts in Ontario as part of a North American tour.

Another Beginning is a compilation of two CDs released earlier in Israel, Supermarket and One Fantastic Day. The songs are all throwbacks to the pre-disco era, with strong melodies, harmonies and guitar licks right out of The Beatles' Rubber Soul. They even use a mellotron, an early kind of synthesizer – how cool is that?

RockFour: Spacey Pink Floyd-like effects and harmonies

But there is a unique sound to RockFour that's unmistakably its own. "We grew up listening to The Beatles, The Beach Boys, The Byrds and The Hollies," says drummer Issar Tennenbaum, 34, on the phone from Israel. His parents are both Canadian immigrants to Israel.

"But especially since we started touring America, we've become open-minded. We are open to everything contemporary like Radiohead or REM. There's nothing wrong being influenced by newer things; otherwise we would sound like a cover band."

RockFour was formed in 1990 in Holon, just outside Tel-Aviv, and has since garnered a large following.

"We're considered the leading band in Israel in the rock scene," Tennenbaum says. "We've sold 30 to 40,000 albums. In Israel, that's big."

The band's first two albums were recorded in Hebrew, but in the late '90s, a decision was made to switch to English – a wise decision if they are to spread their fame worldwide.

"We lost a few fans [when we made the switch]," Tennenbaum admits, "but we have a much stronger support now, especially abroad."

More importantly, the members of the group are more comfortable speaking English. "We actually started singing in English but then translated the songs into Hebrew. We always knew we'd eventually be singing in English."

Tennenbaum is hoping this tour will open many doors. "We're hoping to get lots of exposure. We would like to meet a producer as we would love to do our next album outside of Israel. We're also hoping to be signed by a major label."

He says their show – which still includes some Hebrew songs – is highly energetic, and their sound is different live.

"We bring something different to the show – it's important to see us live," he says. "A lot of people come to see us after hearing the CD – and we blow them away."

He says that while RockFour's sound is "retro," he believes there is a market for it. "In North America and Japan there's a market for everything," he says. "I've been to festivals where many bands sound the same. A lot of people like to hear something different – we're a little more daring."

Right from the opening track Government, with its Byrds-like jangly guitar and melodies and early-Floyd-like spacey effects and harmonies, this album is full of psychedelic rock influences.

"Our music needs time to be absorbed," Tennenbaum says. "I think our our songs as the great classics of the future."

Their Web site, www.rockfour.com, has a forum section where you can read positive comments from the band's fans. "We built our fan base in Israel through word of mouth and it's happening now in America. Our forum keeps growing. People say we're creating a real 'buzz'!"

RockFour are playing at Clinton's in Toronto on June 7, Call the Office in London on June 8 and The Raven in Hamilton on June 9. Their CD Another Beginning is distributed domestically by Rainbow Quartz.

Film explores extreme fanaticism

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Religious or ideological fanatics are a dangerous breed, whether they're Palestinian suicide bombers, Islamic hijackers or even Jewish extremists such as Yigal Amir, who shot and killed Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin.

The Israeli movie Time of Favor – which won six Israeli Academy Awards – deals with the issue of Jewish extremism by focussing on an Orthodox soldier serving in a West Bank settlement.

Pini is part of a newly formed unit composed entirely of Orthodox soldiers from a yeshiva run by Rabbi Meltzer, a dedicated, spiritual man who believes in war as a just cause.

It was Meltzer's idea to form this unit and his motives are treated with suspicion by some in the military who regard him as a fanatic.

Pini is Meltzer's prize pupil, a strong disciple of the rabbi's right-wing ideology. He is thrilled when Meltzer invites him to his house for Shabbat as a pretext for introducing him to his daughter Michal. But Michal, suspicious that she is being offered as a prize to a top student, defies her father and refuses Pini.

When Pini finds out that instead she has fallen in love with Menachem, his unit commander and bunk mate, he feels betrayed by both. Motivated by the teachings of his beloved rabbi, he hatches a shocking scheme that if successful could change history – and possibly lead to a major Mideast conflagration.

Ultimately, the movie becomes a search-and-rescue operation with the Israel Defence Forces, the Mossad, Menachem and Michal hot on the trail of the disturbed yeshiva student.

The movie moves slowly, taking its time to develop its characters. There is a sense as the plot unfolds, amidst a straightforward love triangle, of something terrible bubbling to the surface. Unlike Hollywood films that are action-driven, Time of Favor is character-driven, and the end result is satisfying.

Time of Favor opens in Toronto at Canada Square Theatre May 31. It is written and directed by American-born Joseph Cedar. It won best picture, best screenplay, best actor and best actress at the Israeli Academy Awards. It is in Hebrew with English subtitles.

Capturing street life in Israel

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Anyone visiting Israel with half an eye for the wonderful absurdities of life can't help but stop every few minutes and wish they had a camera.

Israeli-born Alex Levac had that camera and managed to capture the daily paradoxes found in Israeli street life.

By juxtaposing different images – such as a tired Orthodox woman sitting indifferently in an amusement park in Jerusalem next to a billboard of a seductive Marilyn Monroe – Levac's photos reveal many of the physical and spiritual contrasts in Israel today.

One of his photos, from a collection called Our Country that is currently on display at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, portrays bikini-clad women (Israelis, German tourists, does it matter?) dancing around a fully clad Arab woman sitting in the waters of the Sachna, with Middle Eastern men in bathing trunks looking on from the rocks behind.

In another shot, a large group of Chassidic Jews are walking pensively down a narrow Jerusalem street. At the centre of the photo is a kippah-wearing black man.

Many of Levac's photos contain elements of irony and humour that seem to go beyond everyday life occurrences. Those who have never been to Israel can't help but wonder whether the pictures weren't in fact posed.

But anyone who has been to Israel knows that you only have to stop, pause and look – and there will be that woman pulling her sofa across King George Street.

Photographs from Our Country will be on view at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre until June 5.

India's vast, open spaces are alluring

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

RISHIKESH, India — A Canadian in India, whose population exceeds one billion, is immediately struck by its overflowing jumble of humanity.

After a few days in India's incredibly congested and polluted cities, a traveller aches for the solitude of vast, open, sparsely-populated spaces.

If you're game, there are a number of possibilities to consider.

You can raft down the rapids of the Ganges River. You can visit two peaceful towns in the foothills of the Himalyas, Nainital and Rishikesh. Or you can join a safari in Corbett National Park.

In the table-flat plains, the Ganges, sacred to Hindus, is muddy and filthy. But high in the mountains of the picturesque Kumaon region, the river is clear and fast-flowing, lending itself to the thrills – and occasional spills – of whitewater rafting.

At the Mercury Adventure Village and Beach Camp near Rishikesh, six of us, outfitted with orange life vests and black helmets, piled into a red and black rubber raft.

Before we set off on the 16-kilometre route downstream to Rishikesh, our Nepalese oarsman instructed us in basic rowing techniques.

We learned two easy commands, forward and backward, so as to assist him in safely navigating the rapids that lay ahead.

Having conquered the grade four rapids of British Columbia's turbulent Kicking Horse River eight years ago, I confidently assumed that the Ganges' grade two and three currents would be a pushover.

I was wrong.

As we thundered down the first rapid, rowing forward furiously, we were soaked to the skin by an implacable wall of cold water. Luckily, the day was warm and sunny.

For several minutes after that bone-chilling initiation, we floated quietly and serenely, catching our breaths and summoning up our collective courage.

The second, third and fourth rapids were quite turbulent, tossing us around like a bobbing cork.

As we approached the final rapid, a long and churning descent, we changed left-right rowing positions.

Then, crashing head-on into the foaming current, the Nepalese oarsman momentarily lost control.

Jolted violently by the force of the waves, the raft suddenly tipped leftward, throwing three of us into the Ganges.

I held on for dear life, having no desire to test the effectiveness of my lifejacket or my lame swimming strokes.

Jeff, a retired Australian teacher who had sat opposite me in the front of the raft, looked stricken as he struggled to keep his head above water.

Stephanie, our plucky tour leader from New Zealand, and Mary-Ann, a lawyer from southern California, were sucked under the raft for a few terrifying seconds.

Acting with dispatch, the Nepalese oarsman pulled them in by grabbing the top of their life vests.

The crisis having passed, we floated gently into Rishikesh, a pleasant town of gayly-coloured Hindu temples, tranquil ashrams, souvenir stores and a scattering of herbal medicinal shops.

Several days later, we headed for Corbett National Park, established in 1936 by Jim Corbett, the legendary British game hunter, writer and photographer.

Before reaching the reserve, we drove to Nainital, passing dusty, forgettable towns, sugar cane and wheat fields and herds of black water buffaloes.

Founded as a hill station by the British colonial authorities, Nainital, 1900 metres above sea level, is India's honeymoon capital.

Hugging the shores of a small crater lake, Nainital is relatively cool in the summer months, when the rest of India swelters under a broiling sun. On crisp mornings, you can hear birds chirping, chickens squawking and church bells pealing.

Like so many Indian towns, Nainital swarms with rickshaws, the pollution-free transportation of choice throughout this country.

There are no shortage of activities. You can stroll up and down the main street, dotted with cafés, restaurants and shops. If you're in a lazy mood, you can take a restful boat ride on the placid lake. And if you enjoy fine scenery, hop on the cable car to the Snow View, which is higher up in the thickly forested mountains.

The Snow View is spectacular, offering panoramic views of the perpetually snow-clad Himalayas, 300 kilometres in the distance.

Nanda Devi, India's highest peak (7,816 metres), dominates the foreboding, majestic mountain range. China is to the far left, Tibet is somewhere in the middle and Nepal is on the extreme right.

Corbett National Park, which is 1,318 square kilometres in size, was founded to save India's endangered tigers.

At one point, as many as 20,000 tigers roamed the forests of India, but during the pre-1947 colonial era, they were almost wiped out by rapacious hunters and poachers.

Although we never spotted the elusive tiger, the park's chief attraction, we saw langur monkeys, several varieties of deer, wild boars, peacocks, crocodiles and elephants, all of which were worth the price of admission.

And, of course, Corbett National Park transported us far, far away from India's madding crowds.

New group caters to 'in-between generation'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – A new group that began as an initiative of Kolel: the Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning caters to the "in-between generation."

Made up of young adults in their early 20s, Reviving Eden is for those who are in a transition between post-secondary school education and the "real world."

"Our mandate is to offer comfortable, non-threatening, accessible programs that speak to people in their 20s and 30s," said Gail Gould, executive director of Kolel.

The group focuses on both in-reach – to Jews who are affiliated in some way – and outreach, to those who have, on some level, become disenfranchised, she said.

The core group of eight young adults met while taking a Kolel course on Judaism and Spirituality.

"We discovered we tended to lean towards tradition and religion during our time of change and flux," said Jodi Kovitz, who met with The CJN along with Sam Stone, Amy Schnoll, Leah Gitterman, and Gould.

"We shared the belief that one of the few solid rocks in our lives was religion. We all wanted to lean on [Judaism] as a vehicle for introspection to help ease our transition," said Kovitz, who is entering Osgoode Hall law school in the fall.

Gitterman, a research assistant at Princess Margaret Hospital who is headed for medical school, said, "W are looking for [our own] Judaism, rather than one that is being dictated by our parents. That is what brought this all about."

They approached Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, rabbinic director of Kolel, with their idea, "and she was all for it. She introduced us to people who fit our demographics and we had our first planning meeting in November," said Kovitz.

The idea was so well-received, she said, that the group was able to get a three-year grant from the Andrea and Charles Bronfman Philanthropies.

Rabbi Goldstein said that Reviving Eden is proof that this generation of Jews is not indifferent to its Judaism.
